COMFORT

The Key to Happiness and Success in over a Million and a Quarter Homes

NOVEMBER

The Anniversary of Peace

closes an eventful year of untold blessings, and ushers in an era of extraordinary promise to this land of boundless opportunities which has Exceptional Cause for Rejoicing and Thanksgiving

Uncle Sam the Biggest Ship-Builder

American Factories all busy

Thanksgiving without Hooverizing

After serving humanity in the war which was forced upon us, America has emerged from the conflict the Mightiest of World Powers.

We possess a third part of the world's stock of gold and have become a creditor nation to the extent of over ten billion dollars loaned to Europe — America Dominates the Finances of the World.

America leads the world in food-production because Farming Is Our Most Important Industry.

With the products of our farms, mines and factories the largest in the world, and our Merchant marine second only to that of Great Britian and gaining on that, we can Rule the World Markets.

To supply the enormous foreign demand due to the world shortage of everything, will Work Our Industries to Full Capacity.

One and a half million soldiers discharged from service and returned to civil employments have Swelled the Nation's Productive and Purchasing Powers.

With more money in circulation than ever before, with a paying job for everyone willing to work, with an active demand at profitable prices for all products, Business is Bound to Boom.

Uncle Sam the World's Banker

The (American) Watch on the Rhine

Mindful that but for the heroic deeds of our Soldiers and Sailors there would be little cause for rejoicing, let us be thankful that this prosperity enables us, as a nation, to show due gratitude in substantial form to those who have suffered loss of health or limb, and to the dependents of those who made the supreme sacrifice.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

Stop Fighting, Stop Rioting, Stop Striking and Go to Work Is the Basic Remedy for Present Troubles

THE anniversary of the armistice, which ended the world war, finds the world far from peaceful. The more frightful horrors of civil war have succeeded those of international war throughout the greater part of Asia and eastern Europe, the half-dozen republics that have sprung from the partition of the former German and Austrian empires are fighting one another, the people of Russia, that great agricultural nation whose surplus food products helped feed western Europe ere the tyranny of Bolshevism gained sway, are starving. Nor are the peace councils of the Allies free from discord over the division of the spoils of victory. Dissatisfied with their respective allotments of new territory, Greece is demanding a further extension of her boundaries, Roumania is trespassing on Hungarian soil despite the commands of the Great Powers, while the "poet soldier," Captain D'Annunzio, who with his little band of filibusters recently seized Fiume, an important city on the Dalmatian coast, is holding it for annexation to Italy in defiance of the Peace Conference which had awarded this seaport, much coveted by Italy, to the new republic of Jugo Slavia. This amazing exploit has made him the popular hero of Italy, but as the Italian government has disavowed his acts he has boldly declared himself at war with Jugo Slavia and that he will fight the world, if necessary, to hold Fiume for Italy. The Allies, including the United States, are subjecting the city to the miseries of a blockade as a means of starving him to surrender.

Rather Fight Than Eat

IN reason it was to have been expected that the people of these enemy countries, after four and a quarter years of war that had reduced them to the verge of starvation, would have welcomed peace as an opportunity to turn their energies to the production of food and other necessaries for which they were suffering. Such was their dire distress that on President Wilson's request cabled from Paris last winter Congress appropriated a hundred million dollars to send food to them, and Mr. Hoover went over and distributed it. This was to tide them over until they could plant and harvest a crop to provide for their own needs. But apparently these turbulent peoples of Asia and eastern Europe would rather fight than eat, for, as stated, they are still fighting among themselves and consequently are facing a shortage of food and other necessaries. Again they are calling on America for help, but so long as we continue to feed them they will keep on fighting. Let them be given to understand that they must stop fighting and go to work.

Let Europe Go to Work

EVEN in western Europe, Great Britain, France, Belgium and Italy, where there has been no fighting since the armistice, the industrial situation is far from satisfactory. Italy has been disturbed by food riots the past summer and such is the condition of unrest among the people that the Italian government does not dare to proceed with the general demobilization of the army at present. As a result of unprecedented high wages, due to the war, money is plenty as never before, but the people complain that it has little purchasing value because of high prices, and as to food the scarcity is such that everybody, rich and poor alike, is strictly allowanced and none can buy more than his ration card calls for. It is reported that in France and Belgium idleness is too prevalent, due to the demoralizing effect of government and other assistance necessarily given during the war to those driven from their homes or remaining in the devastated sections of those countries during occupation by the enemy. Dependence on government aid and charity rather than on their own resources has become a habit with many of them. A part of Ireland is in the throes of revolution. Since the armistice England, Scotland and Wales have been kept in continual turmoil by a succession of strikes and labor troubles culminating in the recent nation-wide strike of railway employees which, though ended in nine days by compromise settlement, not only paralyzed all industries but was fast bringing on a famine by tying up the distribution of food and fuel.

All Europe is on scant food allowance and it now develops that because of idleness and strikes of the miners in the coal producing countries of Europe the people of that entire continent face an acute shortage of fuel this coming winter. Europe is asking America to send a hundred million tons of coal to supply the deficiency in part. It is impossible to send Europe any large quantity of coal because we have neither the coal to spare nor available ships to transport it. Steamships loaded with coal for the Italian railroads arrived at Genoa, Italy, several weeks ago, and at the present writing are still tied up at the docks unable to unload because of the strike of the dock laborers. There is an abundance of coal in European mines. Let Europe quit fighting, quit loafing, quit striking and go to work not only to supply her own needs but to produce something with which to begin paying her foreign debts and reestablish her credit.

World-Wide Scarcity of Everything Except Money

BECAUSE for the past five years human energies have been largely diverted from productive industry to the destructive pursuits of war there is a scarcity of every kind of product. In other words the world has not produced enough of anything to supply its needs. Of some things—for instance sugar—there is a greater shortage than of others. Shortage or scarcity simply means that there is not enough to supply everybody's wants and so we have to go without certain luxuries that are, extremely scarce, economize in the use of others and go on short allowance of certain necessaries such as sugar at the present time. It ought to be sufficiently obvious that for this troublesome condition the only possible remedy is to increase production—increase it to the point at which the supply will equal the demand, or in other words enough for everybody's needs. It is clear to any sane mind, despite the absurd assertions of certain professional labor agitators to the contrary, that strikes, idleness and lessening the hours of labor necessarily result in decreased production and more distressing shortage of products.

Large Wages and High Prices

THESE same labor agitators also say that raising wages does not raise prices—a prominent one so stated to a committee of the Senate—and apparently they have made many of their followers believe it, although the experience of the past few years has driven this illusion out of the heads of some of them. The rank falsity of such a claim is apparent to those who stop to consider the fact that in nearly all industries labor is the largest item of cost of manufacture. It is manifest that an increase of wages raises the cost of production. The manufacturer, of course, will not stand the loss but will add the increased cost to the price of the product and thus pass it on to the consumer. Wage earners have complained that as wages were raised prices of food, clothing, shoes and other necessaries kept pace, and they have accused the farmers of profiteering by high prices of farm produce. But how can the farmer, who has to pay his hired help double or treble the wages demanded before the war, and a like increase in price for everything he buys, come out whole without raising the prices of his products in proportion? It is beginning to dawn on the more sensible laborers that shorter work hours with frequent strikes and raises of wages result in continually rising prices and increasing scarcity of everything except money of lower purchasing value, and some of their organizations are demanding a halt of this merry-go-round that gets them nowhere.

"An Honest Day's Work for an Honest Day's Pay"

EUROPE has been devastated, impoverished, worn out and demoralized by the long war and it will take a long time for the people over there to find themselves and settle down to peaceful pursuits. But in our country there is no excuse for the rioting, turmoil and industrial and social strife that has become rampant here of late. Our troubles are all of our own making and grow out of selfishness, greed and the disposition of a certain lawless element, largely of foreign extraction, to create here a condition of anarchy, such as has wrecked Russia, in order that in the confusion attendant on the overthrow of law they may profit by an opportunity for robbing and plundering. Prices are high and there is a scarcity of the commodities in daily use, but that is the result of the war and will be of short duration here if our people choose to make it so by settling down to work, attending to their own business and setting their faces sternly against all attempts at lawlessness. The dangerous element of our population is concentrated in the cities, but can be handled by people of the better class there backed, as they will be if trouble comes, by the farmers who are always law-abiding, conservative and patriotic.

That the farmers understand the situation and have ranged themselves on the right side is shown by the action of the delegates to the International Farm Congress at Kansas City, Mo., September 28, in adopting resolutions protesting that organized labor is "demanding more production of the farmers, while demanding of its members less production." The resolutions deplore strikes, except in "grave emergency," and condemn "the growing tendency toward idleness among all classes of people." They also oppose the unionizing of police and other peace officers, declare against government ownership of railroads, and demand legislative action to lower the difference in prices between producer and consumer.

In the same line is the advice of Charles M. Schwab, founder of the Bethlehem Steel Company and recognized the world over as one of the foremost authorities on industrial problems. At a recent meeting of mining engineers in Chicago Mr. Schwab said: "The basis of the so-called German efficiency is founded upon an honest day's work for an honest day's pay, and when that theory is applied here, then will the high cost of living disappear, for there is but one way to secure that—economy and industrial efficiency."

America on the Threshold of an Era of Extraordinary Promise

THE United States has emerged from the war the wealthiest and most powerful nation on earth, and for the first time in its history is in a position to take the lead in commerce and manufactures and to dominate the finances of the world if our people will only avail themselves of the exceptional opportunity which Fortune is knocking at the door to offer them. Even before the war our country led all others in agricultural products and was second to none in manufactures, but lagged far behind in foreign commerce, while London did the greater part of the world's banking. Europe owes more than ten billion dollars to America, and New York has become the financial center of the world. For foreign commerce we have a merchant marine second only to that of Great Britain. The industries of Europe, which formerly supplied the world's markets, are demoralized and the foreign customers who used to trade in Europe are ordering American made goods, but the greater part of their orders cannot be filled because of the paralyzing effect of labor troubles. Let us stop rioting, striking and loafing, the only obstacles in our path to unprecedented prosperity.

His Heart's Queen

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

Here she struck a match and lighted a candle, which she took from her pocket.

A low shuddering cry of terror burst from her lips as she suddenly lost her balance;

Presently the cars came thundering along, and soon she was on the train for Nice.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

On a car, going up a steep hill, leading to the Zoological Gardens of Cincinnati, is Violet Draper Huntington. Opposite her sits Wallace Richardson. Nearly at the top of the hill, something beneath the car breaks. Wallace seizes Violet's hands and locking them behind his neck commands her to cling. The car crashes down, burying all the passengers beneath the ruins. They are the only two alive and hurried to Wallace Richardson's home, are cared for by his mother. Mrs. Mencke, Violet's sister provides a nurse and leaves orders for Violet to see no one. The nurse out for a walk, Violet goes to the adjoining room to meet Wallace and thank him for the life saved. As they become more friendly, Wallace realizes his danger and Violet is hopelessly in love. Violet asks Wallace to come with his mother to see her. Mrs. Mencke takes Violet to Saratoga for two months, then to Cincinnati, and home. The following day, picking up a paper, Violet reads of Mrs. Richardson's death. She goes to the Richardsons' house and expresses her sympathy to Wallace, who unconsciously calls her my darling, and asks her forgiveness. As she whispers, "I am glad," he knows she is all his own. Returning home, her sister demands where she has been, and learning it was at Mrs. Richardson's funeral, that she rides in the carriage with Wallace and Mrs. Dent, Mrs. Mencke denounces it as questionable and that she must drop him for all time. Wallace, calling upon Violet, Mr. and Mrs. Mencke return and she introduces him and admits he is her promised husband. She overhears Belle's and her husband's scheme to place her in a convent. Mrs. Mencke, proposing a trip to Montreal, Violet refuses to go, and Mrs. Mencke takes Mrs. Hawley, who is to sail for Europe and chaperone Nellie Bailey, into her confidence and requests her to induce Violet to join them. Violet makes ready for the proposed trip and Wallace is at the steamer to say good by. Vane Cameron and Ralph Henderson join Mr. and Mrs. Hawley's party and before the voyage is over Vane Cameron surrenders his heart to Violet. Mrs. Mencke schemes that no letters pass between Violet and Wallace and later, joining the party in Europe, gives her permission for Vane to win Violet. Failing to get Violet's consent, she produces a notice of Wallace Richardson's death, which throws Violet into a severe sickness, leaving her sad and heartbroken. Vane Cameron, receiving an encouraging letter from Mrs. Mencke, appears, and tells Violet the wish nearest his heart is to make her his wife. Violet confesses to Vane her love for Wallace Richardson, her sister's opposition, concealing nothing. Knowing she is unhappy from causes other than Wallace's death, Vane urges her to allow him to give her his name, to shield her from sorrow and care. Violet, afraid to yield, and hesitating, faints. Ringing a bell, Mrs. Mencke enters. Recovering consciousness, Violet questions did she promise, and being assured by her sister that she has, she faints again. Mrs. Mencke informs Lord Cameron that Violet acknowledges the engagement, and later she consents to what he thinks best, but with many misgivings. Mrs. Mencke, entering Violet's room, finds the bed made and the room in order and no trace discovered of her. Four weeks later, Lord Cameron, returning from a fruitless search, sees a group near a cliff and the body of a woman upon the beach, clad in dark grey suit with bands of blue silk. Believing it is Violet, Lord Cameron selects a spot near the sea. The next day a stranger appears and requests to meet the woman reported to have married Lord Cameron. Being questioned by the Menckes his right, his answer thrills all—"the most sacred right in the world, for—she is my wife!" Wilhelm Mencke doubting the marriage, Wallace produces the marriage certificate and Vane Cameron confirms it by Violet's admission of it to him. Then he relates her loyalty to Wallace, her unhappiness, the treatment received, her disappearance and later the finding of her body by drowning and the burial. Wallace falls unconscious and Lady Cameron and Vane remain with Wallace through a severe illness. Riding through the crowded streets, Wallace catches the glimpse of a face, looking from a coach window, which unmans him. Vane consoles him with what he knows. Wallace returns to New York, building up a fine business. In the meanwhile, Wilhelm Mencke squanders all at the gaming table and Mrs. Mencke returns to Cincinnati from which place she suddenly disappears.

CHAPTER XIX.

A RETROSPECTIVE GLANCE.

IT was on the fourteenth of May, nearly a year and a half previous to the sudden downfall and disappearance of Wilhelm Mencke and his wife, that a curious incident occurred which has a most important bearing upon our story.

At the foot of one of the mountains which skirt the Gulf of Genoa just a few miles east of the line which separates France and Italy, there stood at that time the dwelling of a well-to-do Italian peasant.

That the man was above the majority of his class, his neat homestead, his thrifty fields and vineyards, and the general air of comfort which pervaded his dwelling plainly betokened.

But he was a stern, harsh man, bestowing little affection upon his family, yet exacting unquestioning obedience and diligent toil from every member, to help him maintain the thrift for which he was noted and to fill his pockets with money.

On a dark and starless night, long after Tasso Simone and most of his family were wrapped in slumber, the door of his dwelling was softly opened, whereupon a slight, girlish figure stole forth and sped noiselessly across the vineyard of olive trees, toward the highway which skirted the gulf.

Upon reaching the road, the flying fugitive moderated her pace, but walked on with a firm, elastic step toward Mentone, which was the nearest town over the French line.

For an hour she walked steadily on, appearing to be perfectly familiar with the way, even in that intense darkness, until finally she paused before a low, rude building, or shed, which had been constructed out of rough boards to protect fishermen from the hot rays of the sun, while cleaning their fish for market.

She sat down to rest just outside upon a rude bench, which she seemed to know was there, and opening a parcel which she carried in her hands, she began to eat of its contents.

Suddenly she paused and listened, for a slight movement behind her, within the shed, had attracted her attention.

A sigh that was almost a moan had greeted her ears.

She did not move for several moments, but waited for the sound to be repeated.

Soon she heard it again, a long-drawn, sobbing sigh like some one deeply grieved or in distress.

The girl arose, and, without a trace of fear in her manner, made her way within the shed, showing by her quick, decisive movements that she was as familiar with the ground as with her own home.

Here she struck a match and lighted a piece of candle, which she took from her pocket, when she saw, with evident amazement, a beautiful girl lying asleep upon a shawl which had been spread over a pile of seaweed in one corner of the place.

The light also revealed the fugitive, whom we have followed thus far, to be a slight, graceful form, straight as an arrow, and having a wiry energy and resolution in her every movement which betrayed unusual self-reliance in one so young.

She was very light in complexion, having yellow hair, black eyes, and bright, rosy cheeks, a somewhat unusual combination in one who was a native of that Southern clime.

She was dressed in the costume of the country, and with a neatness and trimness that made her seem almost dainty in the homely dress, while on her head she wore a large, coarse straw hat, over which a bright handkerchief had been thrown, and was tied under her pretty, rounded chin.

She softly approached and leaned over the sleeper, astonishment depicted upon every feature of her young face; and well she might look surprised, for the lovely girl who lay upon that wretched bed of seaweed was richly and tastefully clad, and bespoke the petted child of luxury and fortune.

She knelt beside her, and, laying her hand lightly upon her shoulder, said, in low, musical Italian:

"Wake, signorina."

The touch aroused the fair sleeper, and she started up affrighted; but, upon seeing the kindly face of a young girl about her own age bending above her, her expression of terror changed to one equally surprised with that of her companion.

"Why is the signorina sleeping here in this miserable place?" the peasant girl asked.

But her companion could not understand or speak Italian, and she shook her head, intimating that she did not know what she had said.

To her surprise the girl then addressed her in broken French, repeating her question, and then the fair stranger, appearing to think it best to confide in her, answered, though with some embarrassment:

"I am in great trouble, and I am running away from it. I have walked a long distance, but became so faint and weak I could go no farther, and stumbled in here to rest, and must have fallen asleep from weariness."

A look of pity and sympathy swept over the peasant girl's face.

Mademoiselle is hungry, perhaps?" she remarked.

"Yes; I had no supper. I could not eat and am faint. I have been ill and am far from strong."

The girl stuck her candle upon a rock and then, going outside the shed, brought in her own lunch which she had left lying upon the bench. It consisted of some coarse bread and cheese, some cakes fried in olive oil, with a few dried figs, and all wrapped in a clean linen cloth.

"Eat, mademoiselle," she said, as she placed it upon her companion's lap.

The beautiful stranger seized a fig and quickly disposed of it with evident relish; then she suddenly paused and asked:

"But do you not need this yourself? I must not rob you."

The girl shrugged her shoulders and shook her head.

"Eat, signorina, eat," she said, mixing her French and Italian; and the other, without waiting to be urged further, and apparently ravenously hungry, quickly disposed of everything save the cheese.

"You are very good," she said, gratefully, when the last fig was eaten. "I thank you very much." Then, with sudden curiosity, she inquired: "But how do you also happen to be abroad alone at this hour of the night?"

Again the peasant girl shrugged her shoulders, and a dark look of passion swept over her face.

"I, too, am running away," she said. "I do not like my home; I have a stepfather; he is cruel, harsh, and wants to marry me to a man I do not love."

"How strange," murmured her companion, a look of wonder coming into her beautiful eyes, while an expression of sympathy crept over her lovely face.

"My father owes him for a pair of fine mules, just bought," the girl resumed, a look of scorn gleaming in her eyes, "and Beppo will call the debt square if I marry him. I will not be exchanged for brutes—I will not be sold like a slave, and to one I hate and loathe, and I fly from him," she concluded, indignantly, the rich blood mounting to her forehead.

"Where are you going?" questioned the other, eagerly.

"To Monaco, to find service in some family, as maid or nurse, until I can earn money to go to some school to learn to study," was the earnest reply.

"You are not an Italian?" the fair stranger said, inquiringly.

The girl shook her head, a sneer curling her red lips.

Evidently to be an Italian was not very desirable in her estimation.

"My mother is Swiss, my own father was French," she briefly answered.

"Ah! That is how you happen to be so light and to speak the French language. Will you tell me your name?"

"You will not betray me? You will not set them on my track, if I tell you?" said the peasant girl, apparently longing to confide in the beautiful maiden, but secretly questioning the wisdom of so doing.

"Surely not. Am I not flying from trouble also? Besides, I am going to another country," was the reassuring reply.

"I am Lisette Vermilet," the girl then said. "I am eighteen years old. I have worked from sunrise till sunset every day for seven long years, in the field, in the vineyard, or the dairy, ever since my poor, foolish mother married her tyrant husband. I do it no more. I take care of myself and be no man's slave, and I marry whom I will, when the right one and the right time come. But first," she continued, eagerly, her face lighting with intense longing, "I study; I learn about the world and other things, like some lovely French girls I saw at Mentone last year, who told me all about the flowers, the birds, the earth, and the sea. Oh, I weep when I think of much there is to know, and I have lost it all—all!" And her voice grew tremulous with repressed feeling as she concluded.

"Poor child! You surely ought to have an education if you want it so much," said her sympathetic listener, in a kindly tone, while she regarded the girl's eager face almost affectionately. "But are you not afraid that your cruel stepfather will go after you and bring you back?"

"Tasso Simone would beat me black and blue if he should catch me," she said, with a shiver, as if she recalled some experience of the kind. "Ah! if I had but a disguise he would not know me—I get away better."

A bright idea seemed suddenly to strike her companion, for her face lighted eagerly.

"Let us exchange clothing," she exclaimed, "then no one will recognize either of us."

"Ah! but the signorina has such beautiful clothes, while mine are so poor," sighed Lisette, in a deprecatory tone, but with a wistful glance over the daintily made traveling suit, at the tasteful hat, and expensive boots which her companion wore.

"Never mind; yours are neat and whole, and no one would ever think of looking for me in them, while you will be much more likely to succeed in eluding your cruel father in mine," the young stranger persisted.

"The signorina is very kind," Lisette said, gratefully, as, with an impulsive movement, she bent forward and kissed the fair white hand that lay within her reach, while it seemed to her simple heart that she should feel like a princess in that lovely dark-gray cloth dress, with its daintily stitched bands of blue silk.

Alas! She did not dream that it was to become her shroud.

Yes, as has doubtless been surmised, it was Violet whom Lisette Vermilet had found lying asleep upon the pile of seaweed in the fisherman's shed.

After refusing to admit her sister to her room on the night previous to the day appointed for her wedding, she had continued her occupation of writing for some time. When she was through she read over what she had written and then deliberately tore it into atoms.

"No, I will not tell them anything," she muttered, with a frown; "I will just go and leave no trace behind me. It may seem unkind to Lord Cameron, but some time I will explain it all."

She then arose and dressed herself in her traveling suit, tied a dark-blue veil about her face, and brought a thick shawl from her closet. She then began to lay out a change of clothing and her toilet articles, but suddenly stopped in the midst of her work.

"No, I will not burden myself with anything," she murmured, thoughtfully. "I am not strong, and I need all the strength I have to get myself away; besides, I can easily buy what I need in any town."

She hastily drew on her gloves, without observing that the rings, which she usually wore and which she prized very highly, were still lying upon her cushion where she had left them before taking her bath. She did not even think to take her watch, which she sadly missed and regretted afterward; her only thought was to get away as quickly as possible from the doom awaiting her on the morrow—to flee from all danger of violating her conscience and of wronging a noble and generous man.

She then put out her light and sat alone in the darkness, waiting for the house to become quiet so that she could steal forth unobserved.

Two hours passed, all in the house seemed to be at rest, and she noiselessly crept out of a window upon the piazza, made her way swiftly around the house to where a flight of stairs led to the ground, and then sped away in the darkness, with no definite idea whither she was going.

She took the highway leading away from Mentone, because she dreaded lest some one should meet and accost her in the town. She had a dim idea that if she could get to San Remo, which was about twelve miles east of Mentone, she could take a train going north without being discovered, and accordingly she bent her footsteps in this direction.

Her way led along the cliffs overhanging the sea before mentioned, and how she, to whom the way was entirely strange, should have escaped the fate which every one afterward supposed to have been hers was wonderful. But escape it she did, and after safely passing this perilous point she descended the hill, and then the road closely followed the beach for some distance.

Here she came upon the rude hut, or shelter, which has been described, and, being footsore and weary with her long walk, she spread her shawl upon a mass of seaweed which she found in one corner, and throwing herself upon it soon fell into a profound slumber, from which she was awakened by the light touch of Lisette Vermilet.

With this brief explanation of Violet's flight, we will return to the two girls who were discussing a change of apparel.

Violet was much strengthened by the food which she had eaten and greatly refreshed by her nap, while she was encouraged by the presence of the young girl, who was also, strangely enough, flying from a fate similar to her own.

She overcame the scruples of Lisette, and insisting upon the plan she had proposed, the two girls, under cover of that rude shed, made the exchange, Violet declaring that every article be transferred in order to make the disguise more complete. She only reserved her shawl, as, in traveling, she knew she would need it.

"Now" she said, when their task was completed, "can you tell me the best way to get north? I am going to England, and from there to America, and I want to get away from this region as soon as possible."

"Mademoiselle would do well to come with me to Mentone and take a train from there," Lisette replied.

"Oh, I could not do that," Violet cried. "I have just come from Mentone, and would not go back there for anything."

It will be observed that she had refrained from saying much about herself thus far, for she did not wish even this simple girl to know the circumstances which had caused her flight.

Lisette thought a minute, then she told her to go on to a village about a mile distant, where, in a couple of hours, a train would make a brief stop at a crossing.

This, she said, would bear her back in the same direction she had come, but she could go on to Nice, where she could take an express direct for Paris.

Violet, much as she dreaded passing through Mentone again, saw that this would be the wisest course to pursue, and decided that she would follow the girl's advice.

"You will not betray that you have met me, if any one should question you, and you will keep out of sight of people in Mentone as much as possible?" Violet pleaded.

"Surely I will not betray you, signorina, and I will not show myself by daylight in Mentone," Lisette said, earnestly, "and you will get away without any trouble, for a peasant girl can go about alone in this country where an English lady could not. Take courage, signorina; nothing will harm you, and may the Holy Virgin go with you."

"I feel anxious about your passing through Mentone," Violet said. "If you should be seen there tomorrow you would surely be stopped, for my clothing would instantly be recognized by those who will search for me; they would compel you to tell where and how you met me, and then they would telegraph ahead and have me stopped."

"Do not fear, signorina," Lisette responded. "I shall pass through Mentone before light, for I am a rapid walker. I go straight to Monaco, and seek service in some French family going to Paris."

Violet looked relieved at this.

How to Meet and Beat High Prices

The Government's great drive for lower prices has not accomplished any appreciable results. But there is a way to meet and beat the prevailing high, and in many cases rising prices.

You can buy of us without money and without price. Instead of spending money you can obtain almost anything you want for yourself or to give at Christmas, free as a club premium.

Write today for our new Premium Catalogue, sent free on request. Begin getting COMFORT subscriptions now so to order premium when catalogue reaches you—lots of fine things for Christmas in it.

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

ONE of the sisters, whose letter follows, says, in speaking of her home town, "We live in a progressive community and have splendid neighbors, with a good school, church and singing class." That is what we should think, and if we don't it may be that we, as individuals, haven't done our level best to make the place we live in all that it should be.

Read the poem quoted below and then ask yourself if you are doing your duty by your town. —Ed.

It Isn't Your Town—It's You

"If you want to live in the kind of a town
That's the kind of a town you like,
You needn't slip your clothes in a grip
And start on a long, long hike.

You'll find elsewhere what you've left behind,
For there's nothing that's really new.
It's a knock at yourself when you knock your town;
It isn't your town—it's you.

Real towns are not made by men afraid
Lest somebody else gets ahead;
When everyone works and nobody shirks
You can raise a town from the dead.

And if while you make your personal stake
Your neighbor can make one too,
Your town will be what you want to see;
It isn't your town—it's you."

WINFIELD, ALA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

COMFORT is a great help to me and I never pick up the paper but what I get some good advice from it.

ANNIE LAURIE MAYS, TEN MONTHS OLD.

I always try the recipes and find them all good. Most of all I enjoy the letters from the sisters, telling how to bring up children. I have one little daughter, ten months old. She has just begun to stand alone and I think it is time to begin to teach her. My husband named her Annie Laurie. I am sending her picture and if you have space for it in dear old COMFORT I should like to see it there.

We live in a progressive community and have splendid neighbors with a good school, church and singing class. We are one mile from the railroad.

My husband's mother lives with us and we get along splendidly and when she went away for a few days we missed her very much. She takes care of the baby for me while I do the housework as I do all of it besides putting up lots of fruit.

My husband is one of the good men we read about. We have been married three years and he is just as kind and loving as at first. Sisters, it is the way you start that makes them what they are.

Love to all.

VIDA MAYS.

PALMER, KANSAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have read the letter written by Grey Ashes and love her because she loves her little adopted child and hope she clings to it till death parts them—and I know of what I speak for death took my little darling last winter. I adopted him when he was three months old, to be a companion and grow up with my little girl (also adopted). We loved her and felt that a child alone would miss much of life's happiness and he grew to be such a dear little fellow, so strong and big and such a happy child. We were proud of him and loved him. I was never too busy to rock him to sleep and play with him. But, mothers, how can I tell you this? One afternoon when he was about two years old I left the room for a few minutes and came back to find him standing in his high chair (which he had dragged from another room) with a patent fly killer in his hands and about to drink the awful poison. I threw it down but found he had his mouth full of the wicks he had chewed up. I got them out and we did all we could for him but he died in a few hours in convulsions. Such dreadful

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

IT seems rather unfair to credit November with "melancholy days" when it is the month that brings us Thanksgiving Day, even if it does add a few clouds and cold, grey weather just for contrast. And if our Thanksgiving table is not graced with the customary turkey there are so many other good things to eat that no one should be melancholy for long. The sisters have sent in some of their favorite recipes for your Thanksgiving dinner.—Ed.

BREADED SAUSAGES.—Wipe the sausages dry. Dip them in beaten egg and bread-crumbs. Put them in the frying-basket and plunge into boiling fat. Cook ten minutes. Serve with a garnish of toasted bread and parsley.

CRANBERRY PIE.—One and one half cups of cranberries cut in halves, and mixed with one cup of seeded raisins. Cream together one cup of sugar and two tablespoons of butter, or butter substitute, and then stir in two tablespoons of flour, and add the cranberries and raisins. Have ready a pie plate lined with pastry; fill, and bake in a moderate oven. When done, cover with a meringue made by beating the whites of two eggs stiff and dry, and then stirring in two tablespoons of sugar. Return to oven and bake until the meringue rises and browns, watching carefully. Cool the pie where there is no draft. Best eaten fresh.

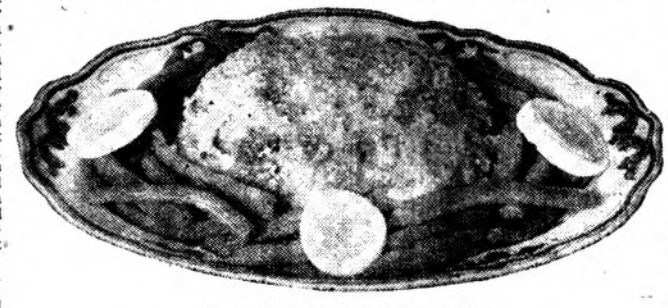
BAKED HAM.—Cover ham with cold water, and simmer gently just long enough to loosen the skin. This will probably be from two to three hours, according to the size of ham. When skinned, put in a dripping pan in the oven, pour over it one cup of vinegar and one of hot water, in which to dissolve a teaspoon of mustard, bake slowly, basting with the liquid, for two hours. Then cover the ham all over to the depth of one inch with coarse brown sugar, press it down firmly, and do not baste again until the sugar has formed a thick crust, which it will soon do in a very slow oven. Let it remain a full hour in oven, after covering with the sugar, until it becomes a rich golden brown. When done, drain from the liquor in the pan and put on a dish to cool. When it is cool, but not cold, press by turning another flat dish on top, with a weight over it. The pressing makes it cut firmly for sandwiches or slicing.

DRIED BEEF.—The most common way of serving dried or smoked beef is to shave it into thin slices or chips, raw; but a more savory relish may be made of it with little trouble. Put the slices of uncooked beef into a frying pan with just enough boiling water to cover them; set them over the fire for ten minutes, drain off all the water, and cut the meat into small bits. Return to the pan, which should be hot, with one tablespoon of butter and a little pepper. Have ready some well-beaten eggs, allowing four to a half pound of beef; stir them into the pan with the minced meat, and toss and stir the mixture for about two minutes. Send to table in a covered dish.

CODFISH CAKES.—First boil soaked cod, then chop it fine, put to it an equal quantity of potatoes boiled and mashed; moisten it with beaten eggs or milk, and a bit of butter and a little pepper; form it in small, round cakes, rather more than half an inch thick; flour the outside, and fry in hot lard or beef drippings until they are a delicate brown; like fish, these must be fried gently, the lard being boiling hot when they are put in; when one side is done turn the other.

BOILED SALMON.—The middle slice of salmon is the best. Sew up in a mosquito-net bag, and boil a quarter of an hour to the pound in hot, salted water. When done, unwrap with care, and lay upon a hot dish, taking care not to break it. Have ready one large cup of drawn butter, very rich, in which has been stirred one tablespoon of minced parsley and the juice of a lemon. Pour half upon the salmon, and serve the rest in a boat. Garnish with parsley and sliced eggs.

CELERY SALAD.—One boiled egg, one raw egg, one tablespoon salad oil, one teaspoon white sugar, one saltspoon of salt, one saltspoon of pepper, four tablespoons of vinegar, one teaspoon made mustard. Prepare the dressing as for tomato salad; cut the celery into bits half an inch long, and season. Eat at once, before the vinegar injures the crispness of the vegetable.—IDA M. B., Portland, Me.



CHEESE OMELET.—Separate yolks and whites of four eggs. Beat yolks well, add four tablespoons hot water, salt and pepper. Beat whites until stiff and fold into the yolks. Have pan well buttered or greased, heat and pour mixture into it. Let cook for two minutes and then place in oven to finish cooking the top. Fold and serve on heated platter. Just before folding sprinkle grated cheese over top. Jelly may be used in place of cheese.

SCALLOPED TOMATOES.—Turn nearly all the juice off from a can of tomatoes. Salt and pepper this, and put aside in a cool place for some other day's soup. Put a layer of bread-crumbs in the bottom of a buttered dish; on them one of tomatoes; sprinkle with salt, pepper, and some bits of butter, also a little sugar. Another layer of crumbs, another of tomatoes —seasoned—then a top layer of very fine, dry crumbs. Bake covered until bubbling hot, and brown quickly.

SALMON CROQUETTES.—One can of salmon, crushed, one cup of milk, one half cup of water, one egg, one teaspoon salt, one tablespoon melted butter and one half cup cracker-crumbs and flour to make medium stiff batter. Drop by spoonfuls into melted butter (or any shortening that has been salted) and fry until brown. Serve hot with lettuce, using salad dressing if so desired.

COLD CREAMED SALMON.—Pick into pieces one can of salmon, and salt and pepper to taste. Whip a cup of cream (either sweet or sour) and flavor with salt and sugar to taste. Serve on lettuce leaves. Tuna fish may be served this way.—MARGARET SULLIVAN, Duke Center, Pa.

SCRAPPLE SAUSAGE WITH RICE.—Clean a hog's head by thorough scraping; split and remove brains and eyes. Put into a baking dish or kettle that can be tightly covered, cover with cold water, and put into a slow oven for five hours. Drain in colander. Set liquor to cool. Remove bones from meat and chop fine. When the fat has cooled and hardened, remove, and put the chopped meat into the liquor. Season with salt, pepper and ground sage. Bring to a boil, and stir in corn-meal wet with cold water until, when cooked, it is about the consistency of mush. When cold, cut into thick slices, and then into strips, and fry in the fat removed from liquor.

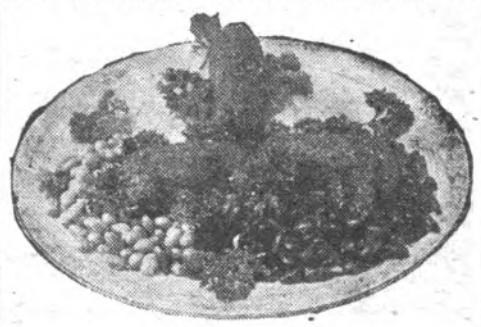
SCRAPPLE SAUSAGE WITH RICE.

PLAIN RICE.—To three cups of boiling salted water, add half a teaspoon of salt and one half cup of washed rice. Boil hard for fifteen minutes, stirring frequently. Set on back of stove to steam, and when rice is soft, drain, and beat with fork to dry out. Put into buttered dish and set in oven to reheat. Turn out on platter, surround with sausage and garnish with slices of hard boiled egg.

SALMON LOAF.—One can of salmon, two cups of cracker-crumbs, three tablespoons of butter, one tablespoon of flour, two cups of milk or water, two eggs, one cup sweet cream and salt and pepper to season. Mix salmon and crumbs. Heat butter and add flour, let cook until brown; add water or milk, season and let boil a few minutes. Then pour over salmon and crackers, add eggs and cream. Put into buttered baking dish and bake half an hour.—MISS BERNICE RUMMER, Lowell, Ohio.

PEPPER HASH.—Eighteen green sweet peppers, eighteen ripe sweet peppers, eighteen small onions. Grind all together and salt to taste. Let stand half an hour then add two cups of sugar, one teaspoon of white mustard seed, one teaspoon of celery seed, and one quart of vinegar. Boil all together for five minutes. Put in glass jars and seal. This is delicious with sandwiches.—MRS. BLANCHE JEFFERS, Shelbyville, Ky.

BANANA FRITTERS.—One cup flour, two teaspoons baking powder, one tablespoon powdered sugar, one fourth teaspoon salt, one fourth cup milk, one egg, one tablespoon lemon juice, three bananas. Mix and sift dry ingredients. Beat egg until light, add milk and combine mixtures. Add flavoring. Slice fruit into batter. Stir well and drop by spoonfuls into lard hot enough to brown a crumb of bread in one minute. Any fruit may be used instead of bananas.



WALDORF SALAD.—Wash apple, remove slice from top, remove center, leaving the shell intact. Cut center into dice, mixed with one third as much celery, diced. Blend with cream salad dressing and refill the shell. Garnish with lettuce leaves and chopped walnut meats.

GINGERBREAD.—One half cup sugar, one egg, one half cup molasses, one half cup milk, one and one third cup flour, one fourth cup shortening, one teaspoon salt, two teaspoons powdered ginger, one teaspoon powdered cinnamon, one half teaspoon powdered cloves, two teaspoons baking powder. Cream shortening and sugar together, add egg well beaten, molasses, milk, baking powder, flour, salt and spices. Mix and turn into buttered tin, and bake in a moderate oven forty minutes. —MRS. HARRISON, Boston, Mass.

APPLE RICE PUDDING.—One and one third cups rice, three teaspoons sugar, four teaspoons corn syrup, three apples. Wash the rice thoroughly and cook until tender in boiling salted water. Drain and add the syrup and sugar. Pare and slice the apples. In a greased baking dish put alternate layers of the rice and apples; cover and bake in a moderate oven until the apples are soft. Remove the cover to brown. Serve with or without sauce.

BAKED APPLE WITH BANANAS.—Six large apples, one cup corn syrup, one tablespoon butter substitute, one and one half banana, six marshmallows. Wipe, pare and core the apples. Place in pan and add the syrup and butter substitute. Simmer slowly, turning frequently until they are tender yet hold their shape. Remove to a casserole and insert one quarter of a banana in each apple. Place a marshmallow on top of each apple. Pour the syrup around them and bake until the marshmallows are puffy and brown. Serve at once.

MACARONI CROQUETTES.—Break macaroni into four-inch pieces and plunge into a kettle of boiling salted water, boiling twenty minutes uncovered. Drain in a colander and then plunge colander with macaroni into a pan of cold water to prevent it from sticking. Cut into small pieces, mix with a little thick white sauce and heat. To every two cups, add the beaten yolk of one egg, three tablespoons of grated cheese, salt and pepper. When cool, shape, roll in crumbs, then in beaten egg and crumbs again, and fry in deep fat until brown. Serve with vegetables.

RICE CORN BREAD.—One and one half cups cooked rice, one and one half cups corn meal, four teaspoons baking powder, one cup milk, three fourths teaspoon salt, one egg, one tablespoon fat. Mix as ordinary corn bread. Bake in a loaf. Corn flour may be used in place of corn meal.

APPLE ROLL.—Two cups corn flour, one half teaspoon salt, two tablespoons fat, four teaspoons baking powder, two thirds cup milk, two cups chopped apple, one fourth cup honey, cinnamon or nutmeg. Mix and sift salt, baking powder and flour; cut in the fat; add milk to make a dough stiff enough to roll. Roll into an oblong one half inch thick and spread it with the chopped apples, honey and spice. Roll the dough up like jelly roll, pressing the ends firmly to keep it in shape. Cut into slices one inch thick and place in pan far enough apart to allow them to swell in baking. Bake in a quick oven.—U. S. DEPT. AGRICULTURE.

BOILED INDIAN PUDDING.—Warm a pint of molasses and pint of milk, stir well together, beat four eggs, and stir gradually into molasses and milk; add a pound beef suet chopped fine, and Indian meal sufficient to make a thick batter; add one teaspoon pulverized cinnamon, nutmeg and a little grated lemon-peel, and stir all together thoroughly; dip cloth into boiling water, shake, flour a little, turn in the mixture, tie up, leaving room for the pudding to swell, and boil three hours; serve hot with sauce made of drawn butter and nutmeg.

SWEET MILK GEMS.—Beat one egg well, add a pint new milk, a little salt, and Graham flour until it will drop off the spoon nicely; heat and butter the gem-pans before dropping in the dough; bake in a hot oven twenty minutes.—MRS. HARRISON, Boston, Mass.

COCOANUT PUDDING.—Beat two eggs with one cup of milk; add one quarter of a pound of grated cocoanut; mix with it three tablespoons each of grated bread and powdered sugar, two ounces of melted butter, five ounces of raisins, and one teaspoon of grated lemon-peel; beat the whole well together; pour the mixture into a buttered dish, and bake in a slow oven; turn it out, dust sugar over it, and serve. This pudding may be either boiled or baked.

EGGLESS CHOCOLATE CAKE.—One cup corn syrup, one cup sour milk, two tablespoons cocoa, one teaspoon vanilla, one teaspoon lemon, one fourth teaspoon grated nutmeg, one half cup vegetable oil, one half teaspoon salt, one teaspoon soda, one and one half cups barley flour, one half cup cornstarch, one half cup mashed potato. Combine the corn syrup, milk and extracts and stir in the vegetable oil. Sift together the cocoa, nutmeg and remaining dry ingredients. Add the mashed potato to the first mixture. Beat well, and then beat in the dry ingredients. Pour into a brick-shaped or tube pan which has been well oiled, sprinkle the top with a little cocoanut and some chopped candied fruit or nuts and bake forty-five minutes in a moderate oven.

FRENCH FRIED SWEET POTATOES.—Prepare and fry the same as the white potatoes. Or they can first be boiled half an hour and then pared, cut and fried as directed. The latter is the better way to cook them, as they are liable to be a little hard if fried when raw.

CHAPTER I.

TWO MEN.

"I HAVE set my heart on the girl, and whenever Nicholas Berdyne sets his heart on any object, woe to him who would stand in the way!"

Two men were motoring through the beautiful Santa Clara valley in the late afternoon of a day that was well-nigh perfect.

Nicholas Berdyne, whose low-spoken but determined words have just been heard, was a somewhat stout, darkly handsome man, well on to middle age. His face, in spite of its strength and comeliness, was marred by lines of dissipation and fast living. Among his coterie of intimates he was known as "Prince Nick"—a title that, in some ways, was most appropriate.

His companion, some years younger, and far from being so well dressed, carried himself toward Berdyne with a cringing deference that was most noticeable. About him, too, there was the same abandon, suggesting unsteady character and a reckless life.

"Of course, the girl is pretty?" observed the younger man.

"Of course, Hartley!" said Berdyne, as though annoyed that the other should think it necessary to put the question. "She was the prettiest girl in Denver."

"But a working girl, Berdyne! It seems strange that a man like you should choose a wife from the working class."

"Why is it the prettiest girls are often to be found among the toilers? Beauty and poverty seem to go hand in hand."

"The very fact that they do," said Hartley Trenwyck, with thinly veiled significance, "gives wealthy men like you their opportunity."

Berdyne indulged in a crafty smile.

"There are no such opportunities where girls like my peerless Beryl are concerned," answered Berdyne, a dreamy light suffusing his sloe-black eyes; "she is my lady of the driven snows, more difficult to win than a princess of the blood. To clasp her in my arms, to feel the rapture of knowing she is mine, will be more than a sufficient reward for all my scheming. If you ever love as I do, Trenwyck, you will understand how such love justifies whatever a man may do to win the object of it."

Trenwyck gave a careless laugh.

"So far as I am concerned, Berdyne," said he, "whatever you do is all right. I stand or fall accordingly as I am high in your favor, or out of it. You have money and I have not; whenever I help you, you are always liberal—so you may count on my aid, at any stage of the game, for anything. You have found that I can keep my own counsel, have you not?"

"Otherwise," said Berdyne grimly, "you would not be here."

"Very good. I think you will serve your own interests best by being perfectly frank with me."

"I intend to be."

"And will you allow me to be equally frank with you?"

"Certainly."

"Have you thought of what Irma will do when she learns you have married Beryl Grayson?"

Berdyne's brow darkened. "Irma has no hold upon me," he returned; "she will have to make the best of it."

"She will be jealous, and a jealous woman is to be dreaded."

Berdyne shrugged his shoulders and dismissed the subject with a contemptuous laugh.

"Then," pursued Trenwyck, "there is Neil Preston, the man——"

Again the scowl came to Berdyne's eyes.

"Beryl has forgotten Preston," he interjected.

"She was engaged to him, and, if she is the sort of girl you say she is, I do not think she would so soon forget."

"Preston went to the Klondike," proceeded Berdyne irritably, "and met his death in the Copper River country a year ago."

"Did he meet his death?" asked Trenwyck.

"The man, Dave Gorsline, came back from Alaska and reported Preston's death to Beryl Grayson."

"Gorsline is one of the worst characters from the Barbary Coast, Frisco, and you had a talk with him before he saw Beryl Grayson."

"I am willing to be frank with you, Trenwyck," said Berdyne, "but I do not care to pursue this subject any further."

"Beryl is an orphan, but if what I can hear is true, she has not always been penniless. Her father was a wealthy mine owner; you and he had some business dealings before he died; and when Beryl was left alone, you had Grayson's mine and she had—nothing."

"Confound it, Trenwyck," cried Berdyne, "what are you digging all this up for?"

"Because I think it necessary for your interests that I should know." Never once did Trenwyck's air of cringing deference forsake him, although his words at times were at variance with his manner. "I have a knowledge of law—enough so that I have been admitted to the bar and have several times given you sound advice. I am seeking to be of help to you now, Berdyne."

"I have a trunk full of papers at my room in a San Francisco hotel," said Berdyne, after a few moments' thought. "Beryl and I will visit the city during our honeymoon, and you shall meet me there, and we will soon go over the papers together. I have long wanted to do something of the kind, and to destroy every document that is in any way incriminating. My man, Hargreaves, has charge of the room and the trunk. Does that satisfy you, Hartley?"

"Entirely, Nick."

"When we reach Sunset Ranch, you will please remember that the girl looks upon me as her benefactor, that in her eyes I am the good knight, sans peur et sans reproche; my goodness to her she is rewarding with her hand, and does not pretend to be giving me her heart. I am content to take her on any terms, and feel sure that in time I shall awaken her love."

"Few women can withstand you, Berdyne, when you choose to make yourself agreeable. And if Neil Preston should put in an untimely ap——"

"If Gorsline were wrong," interrupted Berdyne, with a fierce look, "and if Preston should prove to be alive, never would I suffer him to snatch the prize out of my grasp. Let him who would stand in my path beware!"

"Returning to Irma once more: Where is she now?"

"In Denver, I suppose."

"You came directly to San Jose from San Francisco?"

"Yes."

"How do you know that Irma has not followed you? How do you know she is not doing everything she can to thwart your plans?"

"Because, my dear Trenwyck, I have kept my plans to myself. You are the only person on earth whom I have honored with my confidence."

From that time on, Berdyne and Trenwyck relapsed into thoughtful silence.

The month of April was well advanced, and the rainy season—which corresponds with the California winter—was so nearly over that fair skies had all but become the rule. The air was balmy, and the avenues of pine and eucalyptus, the orchards and vineyards, were in almost tropical luxuriance after the rains.

The road which the two men were traveling led out to picturesque San Jose, winding upward by an easy ascent past rock, glen and rivulet to heights that seemed even fairer than those below. And over all was the brooding shadow of Mount Hamilton, sinister, silent, and, as it were, portentous of the evil days to come.

CHAPTER II.

SUNSET RANCH.

"Then sing the song we loved, love,
When all life seemed one song;
For life is none too long, love;
Ah, love is none too long.

"And when above my grave, love,
Some day the grass grows strong,
Then sing the song we loved, love;
Love, just that one sweet song.

"Ah, darling, I have made you sad! Indeed, I should not have sung it, but it came into my mind as I sat here, and you know that whenever anything comes into your Tonita's mind it is as good as out at the lips. There, there, dear; dry your bonny eyes, or I vow I shall never sing another song as long as I live!"

A lovely Mexican girl had been sitting in a hammock, her slim, brown fingers gliding over the strings of a guitar, and her voice drifting away in dreamy song. Near her, on the broad, low rail of the veranda, sat another—a girl whose wondrous beauty would have won instant attention anywhere.

Tonita, the Mexicana, was dark, with great liquid eyes, glossy blue-black hair, and rounded cheeks of the clearest olive; Beryl, on the other hand, had hair like the lily, and a form so perfect and full of grace it was at once the delight and despair of the artist.

The Mexicana, gazing off across the prune orchards to the misty blue of the mountains, had begun a sad little ballad. In the midst of it a stifled sob broke on her ears. Ceasing abruptly, she put away the guitar, went over to her friend, and put her arms around her neck.

"It is nothing, dear," said Beryl, turning her tear-dimmed eyes upon her friend's face. "The song awoke memories of one whom I loved better than life, and whom I shall continue to love as long as life shall last."

Tonita's head dropped lower, and her lips brushed tenderly against Beryl's blue-veined forehead.

"You are thinking of Neil," she murmured.

"Always, always," sighed Beryl. "Ah, why, why was he taken from me? It is a year, now, since I learned of his death, but I am no more reconciled to it than I have ever been. Time does not heal the wound."

"Does Senor Berdyne know this?"

A shiver ran through Beryl's slender form.

"Mr. Berdyne has been so good to me, Tonita. He has spent hundreds of dollars trying to learn my darling's fate. It was he, you know, who sent the man Gorsline to Alaska, and so discovered the dread truth. He has a noble heart, and worries so over my grief. Of course, I do not love him; how could I, when my love is all in that dreary Northland?"

"You would marry Senor Berdyne, querida, feeling toward him as you do?"

"Oh," cried Beryl, with a burst of tears, "I do not know what I should do! Was ever a poor, forlorn girl so woefully beset? Mr. Berdyne was a friend of my father's, and he was constantly looking after my welfare while I was in Denver. He would have done more for me had I allowed him."

"Did Neil know of Senor Berdyne, Beryl?"

An expression of pain crossed Beryl's face.

"Neil never liked Mr. Berdyne," said she. "In one who was always so generous with others this was something I could never understand. When Neil left to go to Alaska, to look after some of poor, dear papa's mining properties, he warned me against Mr. Berdyne. I wish Neil could have known him as I have come to know him during the past year."

"Perhaps," suggested Tonita, archly, "Neil was jealous?"

"He had no cause to be, dearest," said Beryl hastily, "not the least."

"Of course, he had not!" exclaimed the Mexicana; "but sometimes men are quite unreasonable when they love devotedly. It is their way, dear. Mr. Jackman, the owner of Sunset Ranch, was also a good friend of your padre's?"

"I had never heard of Mr. Jackman until he wrote to me at Denver, saying he had long owed papa a debt, and that he wanted to repay it through me. That was just after I learned of Neil's sad fate, dearest, and I was very sad, and very lonely. So I came here, to this beautiful valley, as you know, and the sweetest part of it all is that I gained you for a friend!"

The two girls by a mutual impulse, threw their arms about each other.

"I could not love you more, dear," breathed the lovely Mexicana, "if you were my own sister. But, come! I must be going home. You will walk a way with me, as you always do?"

They set out together, arm in arm, along a path that led away from the great ranch house, lost itself among trees and vines and roses, and eventually halted at Tonita's door. These hours of companionship were very sweet to Beryl, and they loitered along the path. When they had reached a great red bowlder, about midway between Sunset Ranch and Tonita's home, they seated themselves upon it for a little time, as was their wont. Tonita's witching face had become quite serious.

"Would you be advised by me, dear?" she asked.

"What have you to say, dearest?" Beryl returned, taking one of the Mexicana's little brown hands in both her own.

"Do not allow any mistaken idea of gratitude toward Senor Berdyne to influence you in doing something you might live to regret," said Tonita, her voice throbbing with earnestness. "If you cannot give him your heart, then do not give him your hand."

"I have not promised——"

"Then do not! Be guided by me."

"But——"

Tonita, having eased her mind, withdrew her hand softly and arose.

"Think of what I have told you, querida," she interrupted, flitting down the path. "I will see you in the morning; and, until then, adios!"

Tonita vanished, and Beryl continued to remain where her friend had left her, thinking as she had never thought before.

Mr. Berdyne was so true of heart, and so devoted to her welfare, that he desired only that he might give her the luxury of his wealth, the protection of his close companionship.

As these reflections drifted through Beryl's mind, again she shivered. Once more the tears veiled her violet eyes, and she bowed her face in her hands. In the midst of her sorrow, she felt a rough grasp on her arm, and sprang erect like a startled fawn.

A woman in a rich traveling dress stood beside her, and was just lifting a veil and revealing a face that might be described as coarsely beautiful. Just now the face was as hard as flint, and the eyes burned with cruel intensity.

"So you, with your baby face, are the one who would take Nicholas Berdyne away from me! Away from me, to whom he rightfully belongs!"

The woman's voice rang out with cutting clearness, and poor Beryl drew back in fear and wonder.

"Who are you?" she demanded. "Whence do you come?"

"My name is Irma Lee," was the calm response, "and I have come from San Francisco, to tear the mask from a man who is seeking to deceive you!"

The two stared at each other for a few moments, and then the elder woman came a step nearer.

CHAPTER III.

A WOMAN SCORNED.

Through Beryl's mind ran a host of surmises aroused by the woman's strange words. A baleful light smoldered in Irma Lee's gray eyes, always relentless, but varying in intensity under press of her wayward temper. In one breath she accused Beryl of taking Nicholas Berdyne away from her, and in the next she accused Berdyne of deceit. Beryl hardly knew how to take the woman.

"I do not know you," said Beryl, straightening her lithe form and gazing steadily into Irma Lee's face, "and I do not recognize your right to come to me with such a subject as the one you have mentioned."

A bitter laugh greeted the words.

"I have the right of a woman whose love has been won, then trampled upon and cast aside," said the stranger; "the right to interfere, and save another from the same fate. Look at me, Beryl Grayson! I am no longer young, but I was no older than you when this man came into my life; now there are threads of gray in my hair, and my face is marred by sorrow. I have paid for the right to step between you and Berdyne with all that has made life worth living. Is it not enough? Would you ask more?"

Beryl listened in stunned bewilderment. Could Mr. Berdyne be such a man as this woman was picturing him? The girl would not have it so. This terrible woman must have some base design of her own to serve by thus traducing his character.

"I will not listen to you," said Beryl, and sought to turn and retrace her way to the ranch house. Before she could take two steps the other once more had her by the arm.

"You shall listen!" breathed Irma Lee's voice, with hateful insistence. "Hiding in the bushes beside the path, I overheard something of what passed between you and your friend. You are lovely, Beryl Grayson, but if you had said one word to your friend that would have led me to think you really cared for Berdyne, at this moment you would be hideously disfigured, and your loveliness a thing of the past. See? I had come prepared."

The woman held aloft a small vial, and Beryl gazed with horrified eyes.

"Enough of this," continued Irma Lee, replacing the vial in the bosom of her dress. "You do not know Berdyne's hypocrisy, you have not sounded the depths of his malignant nature. You regard him as a noble gentleman, who, out of friendship for your father, has endeavored to advance your welfare. But I declare to you he has been serving his own selfish purposes."

Poor Beryl, ever loyal to those whom she considered her friends, felt that she should not remain and listen to Irma Lee's words. At the same time, notwithstanding Irma's remorseless jealousy, there was something about her that rang true, and influenced Beryl in spite of herself.

"A man came to you in Denver," proceeded Irma, noting with satisfaction the impression she had made on the girl, "a man named Gorsline. This was a year ago. Gorsline told you that, with his own eyes, he had seen your lover meet his death in the Copper River country, in far-away Alaska."

A moaning sigh burst instinctively from Beryl's lips, and she averted her face. Irma came to her side.

"What Gorsline told you," Irma went on, her voice full of throbbing earnestness, "was false! He had never seen your lover, he had never even been in Alaska! He was a San Francisco gunman, hired by Berdyne to go to you with a lie! Letters sent to you from the far North, and addressed to Denver, have been intercepted; not one has been allowed to reach your hands."

These amazing statements poured from Irma Lee's lips in a torrent. Beryl appeared as one in a dream, fairly astounded by the weight of the revelations. Her wide, wondering eyes were fixed upon the face of the elder woman, and her red lips moved, but no words came.

"It is true," proceeded Irma. "Your good and noble friend"—her lip curled, and a fierce irony rang in her tones—"wanted you to believe that your lover was dead, so that he could encompass his own base designs. Nicholas Berdyne would inveigle you into marrying him—he is even now on his way to Sunset Ranch with this object in view—and he would accomplish this before your lover returns from Alaska."

"Oh, what are you telling me?" cried Beryl, passionately, springing forward and clutching one of Irma's hands in a convulsive clasp. "My darling, after I have mourned him these many months as dead, is still alive? For the love of Heaven, for the love of all that you hold dear on earth, do not deceive me!"

The next moment she had dropped Irma's hand, and pressed both her own hands to her throbbing temples. She reeled as though about to fall, and the elder woman caught her about the waist and supported her.

"Courage, Beryl Grayson," whispered Irma; "joy cannot kill! If what I have told you has gladdened your heart, what supreme happiness is yet in store for you—nay, on the way to you at this very minute."

Beryl's arms clasped themselves about Irma's neck.

"Truly," Beryl whispered, in a transport of joy, "you are my good angel! You have brought a gleam of sunlight into my darkened life, and I pray that God may bless and reward you!"

A look of pain crossed Irma's face.

"I have not come here out of any kindly feeling for you, Miss Grayson," said she sharply, "but simply to foil Berdyne; to keep him from entangling himself with another when he rightfully belongs to me. I am a selfish and revengeful woman, and have no desire to be regarded as an angel of mercy. Compose yourself, now,

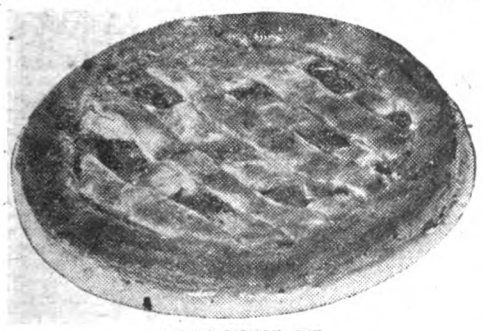
THANKSGIVING RECIPES TEN TESTED WAYS TO USE APPLES



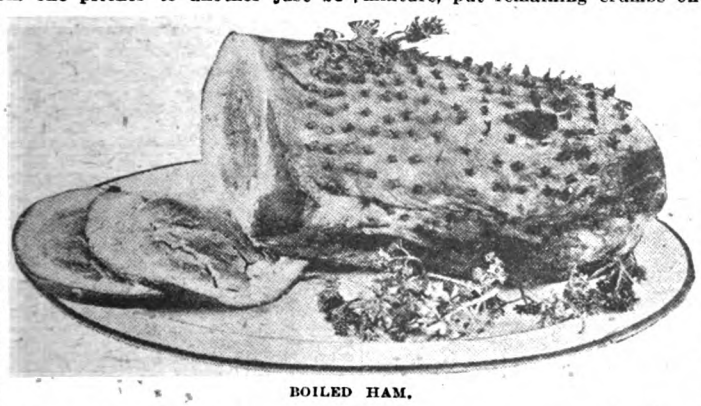
By Violet Marsh

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

WE who live in the country are familiar with the sight of good apples going to waste on the ground. Those who happen to belong to the class who must buy this valuable fruit will wonder and ask themselves if it is neglect or lack of appreciation; or why the word is not passed along that the fallen fruit may be had for the picking up, or that it may be bought at a nominal price. I intend this as a suggestion, hoping in many cases it may prove a happy one, for in all the fruit families we have no better friend than the apple, which contains water, sugar, cellulose, mineral matter and vitamines all vitally important as body regulators.

Apples assist in neutralizing the excess acid produced in the body by too much protein, and the apple juices stimulate the flow of digestive secretions. Many find that eating one raw apple, skin and all, each morning before breakfast is very beneficial. To the invalid it should be served baked, on account of the starch and cellulose content.

MOCK MINCE PIE.



Apples stored for winter use should be put in a dry place, and where it is very cold, but not freezing. Choice ones reserved to eat raw will retain their flavor and original freshness longer if each apple is wrapped in paper and put in boxes.

There are so many uses for apples, and the dishes prepared from them are so varied, that they may be served almost daily without the family tiring of them. Before apples are put in storage, the imperfect ones should be sorted out and made into butter, marmalade, pickle, jelly or boiled or bottled cider.

Apple Recipes

APPLE CIDER.—Press the juice from the apples, let it set twenty-four hours, and then bottle, or put into glass jars. If in bottles, use new cork stoppers and put them in lightly; if in jars, partially seal as in cold pack process, and put into cold water bath with water three inches from the top. Heat to 180 degrees, or the simmering point, and hold it there 45 minutes. Finish sealing the jars. Drive the corks hard into the bottles, cut off even with the tops, and when cold cover with hot paraffin or sealing wax.

A small portion of grape, currant or blackberry juice added to canned apple cider when it is served restores its pungency. Pouring it back and forth from one pitcher to another just before serving, so it can absorb air to take the place of that driven out by heating, also brightens its flavor.

BOILED HAM.

PICKLED APPLES.—Select three pounds of tart apples that are firm and sound; pare, quarter and core them. Cover the cores and parings with cold water and boil hard ten minutes; strain and boil the liquid down to one third of a cupful. Put the apples in a saucepan with one cup of vinegar; cover and very slowly cook one hour. Add the juice from cores and parings, three and one half cups of sugar, one teaspoon of powdered cinnamon, and one half teaspoon each of powdered cloves and nutmeg, boil ten minutes longer and seal in sterilized jars.

APPLE BUTTER.—Overripe apples are not desirable, but if they must be used, add a little vinegar to give some snap to the butter. Use only sweet cider. It usually takes about equal quantities of sweet cider and peeled and sliced apples to make butter of the right consistency. A convenient process is to boil five gallons of sweet cider down to two and one half gallons, and then add five gallons of peeled and sliced apples which have first been cooked into applesauce. Cook very slowly from five to six hours, with frequent stirrings. Sugar to suit the taste may be added when the cider and apples have cooked together about three and one half hours. One pound to a gallon of butter is the usual rule. When the butter is done cooking, add half a teaspoon each of ground cinnamon, cloves and allspice for each gallon. Put boiling hot into sterilized jars.

THANKSGIVING CAKE.

APPLE MARMALADE.—Cut whole tart apples, peel and all, into small pieces, add a little water to prevent scorching and cook to a pulp, strain and measure. To two quarts of pulp add two cups of brown sugar, two cups of corn syrup, and six inches of stick cinnamon and two dessertspoons of whole cloves, tied in a bag. Cook about one hour, very slowly, stirring frequently. Remove bag of spices, add one half cup of good apple vinegar and cook ten minutes longer.

APPLE SAUCE.—This dish must be made according to the kind of apples to be used. The early apples are very juicy and require the addition of little water and quick cooking. Stewed apples may be varied by the use of different flavorings, such as a piece of stick cinnamon, dried orange peel, a little shredded cocoanut, or a little lemon juice, which is especially "tasty" with late winter apples that have lost their flavor. Apples cut into quarters and slowly cooked in a light syrup made from brown sugar will remain whole and have a delicious flavor. Apple sauce is also varied by baking.

BAKED APPLES.—Good-sized tart apples are cored, put into an agate or earthen dish with a little water, and the cavities filled with sugar and a pinch of cinnamon and nutmeg if desired. A few raisins or dates may be stuffed into the cavities. Bake in a quick oven.

STEAMED APPLES.—Pare and core large tart apples. Fill the cavities with nuts and raisins, add a little water, a small piece of butter to each apple and sprinkle the whole generously with brown sugar. Cover tightly and set on the stove where they will steam cook for several hours. Serve with cream.

APPLE MERINGUE.—Core and pare six mildly tart apples, place on a plate and bake till soft. Bring to a scald one pint of milk and pour it over three egg yolks, five tablespoons of sugar and a pinch of salt that have all been beaten well together. Beat the milk and egg mixture and then pour it over the baked apples. Bake until it is firm, and test by inserting a knife-blade. Care should be taken that it does not bake too long. Beat the whites of three eggs until foamy, but not stiff; gradually add three tablespoons of powdered sugar and a few drops of lemon extract and beat until stiff. Spread over custard and apples, return to oven and brown. It is well to set the dish on an inverted pan in the oven to prevent direct heat to the custard.

APPLE OMELET.—Peel and core and steam what will make two cups of tart apples and then mash smooth. Beat three egg yolks, add one cup of sugar, the juice of half a lemon, and beat all together, and then add the well-beaten whites. In a saucepan put one tablespoon of butter, and in it lightly brown one cup of soft fine bread-crumbs. Butter a shallow baking dish and sprinkle over sides and bottom all the crumbs that will adhere; fill with the apple mixture, put remaining crumbs on top and bake twenty minutes in a moderately hot oven.

APPLE JOHNNY CAKE.—Mix together two cups of fine corn meal (white preferred), two level tablespoons of sugar, one teaspoon of cream of tartar, one half teaspoon of soda, and one half teaspoon of salt. Mix fairly soft with sweet milk and lastly stir in three apples that have been pared and sliced. Bake well in a hot oven in a thin sheet.

The Thanksgiving Dinner

The delicious spareribs roast and boiled ham will undoubtedly replace to no small extent the Thanksgiving turkeys and ducks which have advanced in price until we have tried to forget all about them. However, we are going to tell how to cook the proud turkey, just the same, for the benefit of those who are fortunate enough to have raised their own flock, or can "draw" from their neighbors.

But back to the pork products: There is nothing more delicious than well roasted spareribs with the accepted accompaniment of apple sauce, or the home cured, boiled ham served with apple jelly; so with a homy atmosphere and grateful attitude of mind, we shall not miss the turkey.

ROAST TURKEY.—Cock turkeys are usually better eating than hen turkeys, unless a hen turkey is young, small and plump. Draw and clean. Use enough stuffing to fill the skin, that the bird may look plump when served. When cracker stuffing is used, allowance must be made for swelling, otherwise the skin will crack when cooked. Lay turkey in roasting pan and rub entire surface with salt, brush with soft butter and dredge with flour. Place in hot oven, and, when lightly browned, reduce the heat. Baste with fat in pan, and add one pint of boiling

Cubby Bear Hears of a Landslide

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"CUBBY," said Grandma Bear one morning, when she had rested from her journey, "I want you to invite your friends to call on me this afternoon. They were so friendly, being here to welcome me when I came, that I should like to see them all again. Perhaps I might tell them a story. I have lived many years, and could tell strange and interesting tales of the past."

"Yes, indeed, I will ask them," promised Cubby Bear, "and I know they will be glad to come. They will want to see you, and we all like to listen to stories."

There was a great splashing of water, and washing of fur and preening of feathers among Cubby Bear's friends when the invitations had been given, for all were anxious to look their neatest when they called upon old Grandma Bear.

That afternoon they met at Bunny Rabbit's house, and all came to Mamma Bruin's together, in orderly procession.

Shinyblack Crow tapped at the door. It was opened by Cubby Bear, and Shinyblack Crow bowed in his best manner, and said in a polite voice:

"How do you do?" We, inhabitants of the Pleasant Forest, have come to pay our respects to Grandma Bear, if she will graciously receive us."

Cubby Bear stared without speaking. Not that he meant to be impolite, but Shinyblack Crow was looking very distant, as though he did not know his friend Cubby at all. It was plain to be seen that the callers meant to be very formal indeed.

"Tell them to come in," called Grandma Bear. "Now," she said to them, as they solemnly walked in, "do not be so prim and so still. I want to see you have a good time. And do not be afraid. I may be an old bear, but I am not a cross one, and I do not mean to bite any of you."

"It is a fine day," said Shinyblack Crow.

"It is!" agreed Grandma Bear. "All days are fine days, if you will only make yourself think so. Who wants to hear a story?"

Everyone did, of course.

"Then settle yourselves comfortably, to listen," said Grandma Bear. "Now, the best story-tellers are (or should be) those who have lived longest, and I am very old. Today I shall tell you about something that happened to me when I was very small—much smaller than Cubby here—not much more than a baby bear. Cubby, Shinyblack Crow, and perhaps some of the rest of you, have seen the house I have just come from, on the other side of the mountain. That was my second home, where I have spent almost all my life, and this story tells you why, and how, I moved away from the place where I was born.

"My first home was on the mountain side, too, but further north. If you went there now, you would see just a long stretch of bare, gray rock, and you would wonder why anybody should want to live there. But long ago, that rocky space was covered over with good soil, and plants and bushes and big trees grew there. My father and mother had built a house in a pleasant spot. There were three of us little bears, and I was the youngest.

"One summer morning, my sister and brother and I were out at play together. They were larger than I, and their play was rather rough for me. They hurt me, though without meaning to, I dare say, and after a while I went off to play by myself. Not far from home, I found a hollow log, with room enough inside it for me to crawl in and stretch myself out. I thought the others might hunt for me, so kept very quiet, for I was tired and did not want to play. How long ago it was! And yet, I remember it so plainly!

MY MOTHER TOOK HER TWO LITTLE BEARS AND RAN OUT OF THE WAY OF THE SLIDE.

"By and by I fell asleep, and slept very soundly indeed, as you will agree with me when you have heard all the story. My mother told me many times what happened afterward, so I know as well as if I had stayed awake.

"You have all seen dark clouds gathering in the sky when a thunderstorm is coming, until the whole sky is covered and the sky hidden from sight. Well, that morning, great, dark clouds came rolling up in the sky from two opposite directions, so that the east and west were darkened while overhead the sky was bright. When my mother saw the bright space growing smaller and smaller, and darkness from the oncoming storm settling down, she was frightened, and began hunting around for her three little bears.

"My father had gone away that morning, down to the river a few miles from home. My mother found my sister and brother without trouble, but, as you know, I was hidden from sight in a hollow log. Only a narrow strip of sky was left in sight, and over that little ragged scraps of cloud were straggling.

"Then the two great, dark cloud-banks rushed together, blotting out the last bit of sky, and a terrible downpour of water followed—what is known as a cloudburst. Great gullies were washed out in the ground in no time, down which muddy, foamy water dashed.

"Then a louder sound was added to the roar of the storm. Up near the top of the mountain the cloudburst had loosened some dirt and rocks, and these, rolling down the steep slope, carried along with them more dirt, more rocks—more and more gathering all the way until bushes were torn up, then great trees, and, finally, all the layer of soil over the solid rock was loose, and tumbling, sliding down the mountain side.

"My mother took her two little bears and ran out of the way of the slide, but I was in the log, hidden away, and still asleep.

"Oh, Grandma Bear, were you killed in the awful land slide?" cried Cubby Bear in distress. Then, seeing what a foolish question he had asked, poor Cubby Bear stepped behind Grandma Bear's chair, and covered his face with his paws. No one laughed at him. They were all too excited and interested.

"This is better than Wise Owl's stories!" breathed Mollie Muskrat,

"Oh, keep still, so Grandma Bear can tell the rest!" said Busy Beaver.

"They were only just in time," went on Grandma Bear. "The land slide went tearing past them, carrying away our house, the log I was in—everything—leaving only a slope of bare rock behind. At the foot of the mountain the great mass spread out over the level ground, and stopped.

"Well, my mother and father found each other after the awful rain had stopped, and together they looked over the great rough piles of dirt and rocks and broken trees. I can remember the rest of it myself. It was along in the afternoon when I woke, feeling hungry after my long nap. My log seemed to be standing up on end instead of lying down as it had been when I crawled into it. I squirmed and struggled and at last got to the top of it. The lower end was stuck in a great pile of dirt.

"Looking out, I saw at a little distance my mother and father. I called to them, and they hurried to where I was. I was frightened, and thought I could never get down, but my father stood down below me and told me to jump. I landed on his back, and was not hurt.

"And that," ended Grandma Bear, looking around with a smile, "was how I first went down the mountain, and why I moved into a new home."

"I would not want to risk one of my Bunny Babies in a wild ride like that!" shivered Bunny Rabbit.

"Nor I, one of my children!" echoed Betty Badger.

"I would like to have such a ride!" declared the oldest little Badger. "I would not be afraid, and I would stay awake, so not to miss the fun!"

They thanked Grandma Bear for her story, and she promised that some day she would tell them another one.

Crumbs of Comfort

Fear is faithlessness.

Even genius must have labor.

A man's heart is older than his head.

We make our fortunes and we call them fate.

The greatest of faults is to be conscious of none.

We must not expect our friends to be above humanity.

Other men are lenses through which we read our own minds.

Many men are like stone jugs and can be carried away by their ears.

All men would be masters of others and yet no man is lord of himself.

No genius has ever yet had the smallest success in explaining existence.

There are great helpers in the world who encourage others to do their best.

STATEMENT OF THE OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT, CIRCULATION, ETC., REQUIRED BY THE ACT OF CONGRESS OF AUGUST 24, 1912, OF COMFORT, PUBLISHED MONTHLY AT AUGUSTA, MAINE, FOR OCTOBER 1, 1919.

State of Maine,..... } ss.
County of Kennebec,... }

Before me, a Notary Public, in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared Guy P. Gannett, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the Assistant Business Manager of the COMFORT and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management, etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of August 24, 1912, embodied in section 443, Postal Laws and Regulations, printed on the reverse of this form, to wit:

1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor, managing editor, and business managers are:

Publisher, W. H. Gannett, Publisher (inc.), Post-office address, 20 Willow St., Augusta, Maine.

Editor, A. M. Goddard, Post-office address, Augusta, Maine.

Managing Editor, William H. Gannett, Post-office address, Augusta, Maine.

Business Managers, W. H. Gannett, Bus. Mgr., Guy P. Gannett, Assist. Bus. Mgr., Post-office address, Augusta, Maine.

2. That the owners are: (Give names and addresses of individual owners, or if a corporation, give its name and the names and addresses of stockholders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of the total amount of stock.) Owner: W. H. Gannett Publisher (Incorporated), 20 Willow St., Augusta, Maine.—Stockholders:—W. H. Gannett, Augusta, Maine; Sadie H. Gannett estate, Augusta, Maine; Guy P. Gannett, Augusta, Maine.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are: (If there are none, so state.) No outstanding bonds, mortgages or other securities.

4. That the two paragraphs next above, giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company but also in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, is given; also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona-fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than as so stated by him.

HOP up onto my lap as I want to discuss with you something that deeply concerns the health and welfare of our nation. Directly I mention the subject, thousands of you will throw fits, which only shows that those who have a fit are unfit and need attention.

The health of a nation and its physical well-being should be the first consideration of those who are charged with its care and welfare. When the men drafted for the late war were examined by the surgeons, the authorities and all who knew what a terrific task we had before us were not only shocked but at times horrified at the physical condition in which they found vast numbers of those on whom the life of the nation depended. One out of three of those who ought to have been in robust health was unfit to bear arms. What was the use of boasting about the enormous fighting material we had to draw upon when practically one third of it could not shoulder a rifle? Now throw out the alien population, the cowardly conscienceless objectors, the draft dodgers, and those who must make guns, munitions and raise food for those in the field, and you will see the huge reserve of fighting material on which we could draw in case of war was no larger than that of Germany; though the German, with his horse, dog and sausage diet had nothing like the opportunity, as far as food was concerned, to build up a healthy body as we had. However, for fifty years, he had at the most vitally important period of his life, been given a thorough bodily overhauling and then subjected to a physical and military training that put every organ in his body in splendid condition. He came to the barracks a hayseed and a boob with one shoulder knocking against the other, and he left for home so smart, erect and alert, his own mother could scarcely recognize him.

Dr. Eugene L. Fiske of the Life Extension Institute says: "We are wont to be proud of the health of the nation; our men were held up as examples of clean strength and proper living. In the boards investigated in Detroit, Brooklyn and New York, I found that out of the total number of 7,611 examined, the number rejected for physical reasons was 2,232, a rejection rate of 29 per cent. The rejection in the cantonments of those passed by the local boards has varied between two and 11 per cent. It is safe to say, then, that the total rejection rate for physical reasons would lie between 30 and 40 per cent, and this is the most favorable age group."

Dr. Fiske's figures show that even among our best fighting material one third would be thrown out on account of physical disability. Now there is only one remedy for these appalling conditions and that is to take our youths of 19 and give them at least six months' physical training for a year or two, with good nourishment and plenty of fresh air and exercise. During this period a certain amount of time should be given to military training, just enough to make a man physically capable of quickly developing into an efficient soldier should the need arise. The rest of the time could be given to building up both body and mind, to bridge building, road making, etc., and time should be given to acquiring a trade, technical training and education. This is not a scheme to make cannon fodder but an education in the school of good citizenship, an education that will make for character, and convert selfish, indifferent youth into the flower of American manhood. All those who have seen our boys come home from Europe in their smart uniforms have noticed with pride the wonderful transformation that has taken place in the appearance of these young men, who in pre-war days just hung around like a bag of meal with their chins scratching their chests and with a general air of slouchiness and slobbiness which made them look as though they were trying to give an imitation of a sick dog.

The physical condition of the girls is probably worse even than that of the boys. While a man wants good, substantial food and lots of it, if a girl can fill herself up with candy, cake and soda water abominations, she is perfectly happy. Also, she does not give her internal organs a chance, for instead of sticking out her chest and pulling in her stomach and throwing her shoulders back, she gives a fine imitation of a flour sack that is full in the middle and empty at both ends. Our girlies, too must give the nation a few months of their lives, both for their own sakes and for the good of the race. Then they can learn to attend to their bodies, have their teeth fixed, adenoids removed and the paint scrubbed off their faces. They should also be taught nursing, so as to be able to care for the babies that may be theirs in after life; study hygiene, domestic science, the chemistry of foods, etc., and leave Uncle Sam's national university, worthy mates for the men, who, too, have been transformed from slobs into gods and who will journey hand in hand with them along the pathway of life, perfectly equipped with the essentials for right living and right thinking; enlightened of mind, exalted of spirit, with a heart for any fate, and with a body and soul prepared to tackle any problem. The world is full of broken bodies, undeveloped minds and withered souls. Ignorance, stupidity, credulity, criminality and every form of depravity abound, and Death swings his scythe and gathers in men, women, boys, girls and helpless babes, just because nobody cared or knew just what to do at the vital moment when a little knowledge, skill, care, judgment and initiative were all that was needed to save the situation. This waste of life must stop.

At least a good third, or even more of our population, has not become Americanized, and talking will not Americanize them. Each racial group herds by itself and makes faces at other racial groups who all make faces at one another. We look like a happy family on the surface but when you probe beneath our national skin you find conditions that are appalling. The sons or daughters of people who have been here three or even four generations, people who had hardly a shirt on their backs or a shoe on their feet when they came here, and now have a different car for every day in the week, write me the most villainous letters of hate if I dare to hit their fatherlands or motherlands or remind them of their duties as citizens. Their bodies are here grabbing the dollars but their hearts and souls are over in Europe. They tolerate Uncle Sam and wave the flag but in their hearts it is a Kaiser, a king or a spiritual head of some all-powerful religious sect or denomination, that deep down in their souls they worship and bow down to and are ready to battle for when they feel strong enough to grab the reins of government.

We have in this country today racial groups that can by combining their votes (and they probably will combine them) control Congress and run this country in the interests of their homelands. They would reverse the policies of this government and involve us in wars that would make vain all the sacrifices of this late terrible conflict and involve the whole world in universal ruin. We drove Germany over the Rhine but in spite of defeat, Germany will in all probability win the peace which is tantamount to saying she has won the war. We will not keep watch and guard over Germany, and as England, France and Italy are weakened economically and financially, have lost the cream of their man-power and are torn with labor upheavals, Germany will, as sure as fate, arm again quickly and promptly, sweep aside the frail barrier of impoverished Poland, join hands with Russia, and make an alliance with Japan for the control of Asia. As we have twisted Japan's tail almost as often as we have twisted the British Lion's, such a combination is not unlikely, and then we should have our troubles, for in the next war there will not be a hole or corner as big as a pin point in which men can find protection. The whole earth will be swept by airplanes, dropping bombs that will poison people not by the hundred but by the tens of thousands. The indifferent Northwest will not be able to snooze in security as it did in the late war while we on the Atlantic coast lived in daily dread of shell fire and gas bombs. I'm not an alarmist but the results of this war show that the human leopard has not changed his spots and partizan politicians are not likely to help change them to any great extent.

Only an awakened national consciousness, only the drawing together of the flower of our youth and educating them in the highest ideals of citizenship, only the threat to deport those alien parents and grandparents who insist on keeping their children American haters and fanatical worshipers of the lands of their ancestors, will give us a nation instead of a polyglot foreign boarding house. Citizenship implies responsibility, and if one refuses to fight, some other mother's son must protect the cowardly hide of the miserable parasite who won't fight. We have got to give the youth of our land healthy bodies and a training that will make them neither pro-German, pro-Irish or pro-Italian or pro-anything, but pro 100 per cent American. This is not militarism. It is common sense. It is the preparedness that makes for peace, puts sound minds into patriotic bodies, and eliminates the menace of the unabsorbed alien, makes the melting pot do its work and links all racial elements into one indissoluble bond of good fellowship and genuine Americanism. General Leonard Wood has already got this scheme going and Congress will do the rest. It will cost money to do this job but it will cost us our national life if it isn't done.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers, and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk covers, either one for a club of three subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the picture book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

KENOSHA, 751 N. Sheridan Road, WIS.
(Home Address.)

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

It was in April, 1918, I paid you that memorable visit previous to embarking for France, where I've been ever since. I have never missed a single copy of COMFORT since I have been there. I let the boys read what that bootlicking, Kaiser-lover, "Uster Be Reader," wrote, and they say she should be deported to Germany without delay. Our boys know all about the Huns as they have seen too many evidences of their terrible crimes. A man stabbed by one of their saw bayonets, which no other nation used, is doomed. They set traps filled with explosives in their retreat, and left behind them imitation pencils which exploded, killing and maiming numbers of innocent little children who handled them. The Huns broke the terms of the armistice three times within 48 hours. While their delegates were signing the peace treaty, other Germans sunk six battleships in the Kiel Canal and sunk their fleet which they had surrendered to the Allies as part of the terms of the armistice. These were acts of war and all typically German. There was a foreign legion of Czecho-Slovaks, about 140,000 men, fighting with the Allies. It was they who deserted Austria, their enemy, and went over to the Russians, who after the latter went Bolshevik, tried to hand the Czechs over to the Germans. These Czechs, quick to note the menace of Bolshevism, have been the mainstay of Kolchak's army, fighting on the Siberian front to keep these vermin from overrunning Asia. My brother brought home an English bride from Liverpool and 27 men of Co. F, 162nd Inf., also brought English brides to the States. I am coming back alone. The Red Cross and other organizations did noble work for our soldier boys.

With best wishes to you, Maria and the Goat,
Your nephew, JOHN STREJCEK (HAPPY JACK),
Field Hospital No. 7, 3rd Division.

Delighted to hear from you, Jack, and to know that you kept your eyes open while in France and have familiarized yourself with some of the vital facts of Hun deviltries and world conditions. The war has taught the Hun nothing, and if we don't develop a national spirit, and labor in this and Allied countries does not work more and strike less and quit allowing radical extremists and agitators to lead it by the nose, we'll be headed for ruin, and then little old Germany, planning and plotting, while the rest of us are fooling, will grab us by the throat and finish the job she started in 1914. We cannot trust either the German government or its people, for honor and sincerity are virtues they do not possess. By the terms of peace they were to have an army of 100,000 men, but they have already gotten together half a million soldiers camouflaged as semi-policemen or home guards, veteran warriors. They were to get out of the Baltic provinces but instead of going they have stripped the country of every movable thing, digging up even the caskets in the cemeteries and ripping off the metal ornaments. Before me is a picture of a French child with half its face blown off by a Hun explosive pencil. And then we are asked to buy their blood-stained toys! Ye gods, why can't humans be humans! Now note what is happening in the U. S. "Reading, Pa., May 28. William Burns, the first American citizen, not of German birth or origin ever elected president of this city's oldest and wealthiest social club with 1,000 members, today announced that he has resigned the presidency and that he will also give up his membership. Mr. Burns said he found the German flag flying from the staff when the Reading soldiers of the Rainbow Division came home and that he tore it down, putting up the only American flag in the house." Mr. Burns is quoted as saying that he was misinformed as to the real character of the club and the courts ought to close the place in view of what has happened in the past. Here is another: "Michigan City, Ind., May 28. Several hundred soldiers, sailors and marines last night unanimously adopted resolutions opposing official participation in July 4 honors for them, by Mayor Fred O. Miller, German born,— the Mayor received his naturalization papers ten days ago. The soldiers declared he did not show the proper spirit toward them when they left for the war; that he embarrassed them during the war; and that the City Government displayed no kind of welcome when they returned." "Stamford, Conn., Nov. 21. The county commissioners denied today the application for a club license filed by the Arbeiter Maennerchor, a workman's singing society.....The organization gave as part of its purpose: 'the perpetuation of German songs, the German language, customs and sociability.'" A big organization to replace the treasonable German-American Alliance is now being formed. The Hun is at his old tricks and if not closely watched all the sacrifices of our blood and treasure will have been in vain.

FRANSTOWN, TEXAS.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Billy the Goat is a mighty pretty goat. I think she is about the sweetest little girl I ever saw. Uncle, what do you think about dreams? Of course I know there is nothing to these nightmare dreams only that one has eaten too much supper or is sick in some way. But it seems to me some dreams have a purpose. Please don't think that I am superstitious. I just want to know what you think. Prospects certainly seem brighter than at this time last year, don't they? I hoped last year that things would be better this year, but didn't expect such a great improvement. Brother is still in the navy. Some of you folks write me. We may move this winter and I'd like to hear from different places.

As ever your niece, NELLIE MCLANE, No. 42864.

Nellie, if you want to know what the wise guys of science have to say about dreams, you'd better buy an encyclopedia. We dream because the suspension of mental activity is not complete, in fact, some authorities think that sleep is never so profound as to be dreamless, but this theory cannot be proved. For five months in 1918, Nellie, I did not dream at all and for very good reasons. During that time I don't think I slept more than ten and a half minutes. I am, however, a good dreamer, a practical one while awake and the usual kind of fool dreamer while asleep. Don't attach any importance to a dream as some superstitious idiots do. During the war, while the German subs were raiding our coasts and airplanes by the score were darting hither and thither in the skies overhead, I dreamed that the Kaiser was dropping bombs on my cocoanut. I could not only see Bill throwing them down by the ton but I could feel them. Finally when I awoke I found that a heavy rainstorm was raging and the water had leaked through the roof and was dropping in a torrent on my bald spot. On another occasion I fell asleep and had a most delicious dream. The daughter of the mighty potentate of some Oriental country, gorgeous and beautiful, was pressing her luscious lips to mine. Ah, me, those beautiful dreams never last long, but when I awoke I found the dog, owing to the high cost of living, was making a meal off my mustache. Don't worry about the night dreamers, but keep your eye on the day dreamers. They are the ones that need watching. The Kaiser dreamed of world domination, now he is sawing wood. Every good German dreamed of floating round in a sea of beer, now they have to suck loganberry juice through a straw or go thirsty. Bela Kun, the Jew Bolshevik fanatic, dreamed of a Bolshevist Hungary, now he and his brother revolutionary Jew profiteers are in jail or hiding in the tall grass. A lot of dreamers have been put to sleep and a lot more to work and they have been put where their dreams will no longer be harmful either to themselves or humanity. Sorry to say, Nellie, that I don't think the world is better today than it was this time last year. There are still about two or three hundred wars going on and three or four million strikes. Heroism, patriotism and self-sacrifice, which seemed to lift us and other nations out of the rut of selfishness during the war and which ennobled us while we were fighting a common enemy, seem to have entirely disappeared, and we are all now engaged in a contemptible struggle to see who can drag the last possible penny out of the other fellow's pockets. If all humanity could only have an ice bag put on its head and be put to sleep for a couple of years until war hysteria and the grab mania have worn off, we could all wake up in a beautiful, happy, peaceful, contented world, a world in which we would find the lion lying down with the lamb without having the lamb inside him.

CENTER, COLO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I have read many letters from the cousins that are good, and many others, which I suppose were written by outsiders who were exasperated because you dare to reveal in their true light what the enemies of our country are doing, and these made my blood boil. It is no wonder that the Germans and Bolsheviks vent their spleen on you. It is because they know that you tell them the truth and it is always the truth that cuts deep and hurts the guilty person. If there were a few more people like you in the world it would be a place worth living in. I wish someone would come to this section of the country and try and bring home to the people here what kind of lives they are leading. They regard Sunday the same as any other day and they go from five to twenty-five miles away from home to dances, but will not go one mile to church or Sunday school. I can't get used to that sort of thing. I have lived on a farm all my life in the western country and love it. Can see the mountains around us stretching toward the skies with snow-white clouds floating about; it is so beautiful and the green fields, too, stretch as far as my eye can see. Am five feet, ten inches tall, have light brown hair and gray eyes and fair complexion, live on a farm and can do most any kind of work that is put before me. Am fifteen years young, strong and healthy.

Lovingly yours, ALICE A. HUGHES.

Alice, your letter was a tonic. Thank God there and there scattered throughout the land there are a few girls who have sound common sense and character, and respect the Sabbath and are endowed with a goodly share of those Christian virtues which, alas, in this pleasure-loving, dollar-chasing age of frivolity, insincerity and camou

A Silhouette Party

Silhouette Making

AN OLD SILHOUETTE PORTRAIT.

HOW many of us can recall with what wonderment and curiosity we gazed for the first time on a silhouette and asked if it really was anyone's picture and why it was all in black. And how we were told that it did represent a real person and that it must have been a great-great-somebody, for the fashion dated back many years ago, and that these old silhouettes are highly prized by collectors of curios.

And now that the making of silhouettes has been revived for amusement's sake, and at a time when the world calls for studied economy, the story of the silhouettes takes on new interest and is well worth the telling.

It appears that the name comes from Etienne de Silhouette, French minister of finance in 1759. At this time France was in a state of great exhaustion due to a war which had just terminated. To correct the evils of the situation, Silhouette established the most rigid economies, which lasted nine months, when he was obliged to resign his office. To economize cloth, coats were made without folds, plain wooden snuff-boxes took the place of those made from the choicer materials, and among all forms and kinds of restrictions, the making of painted portraits was prohibited for a time, and in their place outlines only were drawn in profile. All these fashions were called "a la Silhouette" at that time but soon passed into oblivion except that the profile shadow portraits still bear his name. We find a parallel at the present time in our newly coined word "Hooverizing."

The ease with which the Silhouette was produced recommended it to public favor before the discovery of photography had provided an inexpensive method of portrait making. The Silhouette soon became popular in England and America, where it continued in vogue even up to the time of our great-grandfathers.

The usual way of making a silhouette is to have the subject stand or sit so as to throw a clear, well-defined shadow on a sheet of paper fastened to the wall; then with pencil or crayon the artist traces the outline of the shadow, and following the tracing cuts it out with the scissors. The outer part can be used as a mat pasted on black paper. The skilled silhouette artist of old usually reduced the size, frequently to that of a modern post-card photo. Moving silhouettes are a new and popular feature at the motion picture theaters.

Silhouette Game

Any one in search of a lively evening's entertainment will do well to try this game, for it furnishes boundless merriment and matches up the skill of the participants.

An equal number of ladies and gentlemen should be invited. The name of each lady is to be written on a card and placed in a box from which each gentleman is to draw, and the lady whose name he draws becomes his partner. At the sound of a bell, it is announced that each lady in turn will pose so as to cast her shadow that her partner may draw her silhouette. Right here a great opportunity presents itself for fun-making, for a slight variation in position may cast a shadow not at all flattering to the one whose silhouette is being drawn, and suggestions for improvement by the guests are likely to provoke much wit and merriment.

A given time is allowed for the drawing. When the ladies' portraits have all been drawn, the gentlemen pose in turn to have their silhouettes drawn by their respective partners. Each silhouette is cut out and the mat is pinned on a black cloth curtain hung on the wall.

In regular order the guests are asked to name the person whose likeness each silhouette is supposed to represent, and the one giving the largest number of correct answers receives a prize. A prize is also given for the most perfect likeness.

Another element of fun may be introduced by having the ladies' silhouettes cut and passed upon before the gentlemen's are drawn, for in case of neglect to make pronounced any special point of beauty, the ladies have a chance to "get even" with their partners when drawing the gentlemen's silhouettes.

agony I cannot describe. At first he was in a stupor and I watched the pink fade from his cheeks and lips, and his eyes fade until the light went out and he grew weaker and weaker. My every breath was a prayer, "O God, save my baby," but a little later, when the spasms came on, he grew cold in my arms. No one knows what I suffered but when we laid him away in his little white casket I knew only his precious body was there, while his soul was safe in the Home where no harm can touch him and yet my cry was and is yet, "I want my little son." God has given me another baby. She was only three weeks old when I found her and her sweet ways and lovely self have been a great comfort to me and her care has kept me busy but I still think of that terrible time and wish I had been more careful or else not had the dreadful stuff around the house. I thought it was out of his reach and that I was careful enough but I wasn't and my boy paid the penalty with his life.

Please forgive me for writing this, but if I can save one little child, keep one bright-eyed baby alive, by telling my Billy's story, I shall be glad.

MRS. JOSIE LEE.

Mrs. Lee.—A story as sad as yours must necessarily be depressing; your plea is too strong to be ignored and if your letter will make other mothers more careful it shall have a place in our corner. I am so very sorry for you. Every household should have a medicine closet and in it the necessary antidotes, with directions for using, for the common poisons.—Ed.

GOD'S COUNTRY—THE GOLDEN WEST.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

As I have been reading COMFORT and listening to the sisters' letters, some of happiness and some of heartaches, I want to say a few words in defense of the husbands. I have not been married very long, but I have the kindest, most considerate husband in the wide, wide world. For years before my marriage I gazed upon men with horror, almost. Why, you ask? Because of the tragic stories related to me by unhappy wives,—some blaming the men for unfaithfulness, some for being (excuse the slang) tightwads, and the thousand and one things that women find fault with and for which blame the men. Then I began a search—the hearts of my neglected friends, and to my surprise found at least three quarters of the sad-hearted ones—with unfaithful husbands, to blame for their own trouble. The world goes round at a rapid pace, times change, as do the ways of the world with every season, but I have never yet met the man that will stand true to a woman who will encourage the attentions of other men. You who have trouble and always compare your husband's faults with other men's virtues, search out your own heart and see if you do not need to set a good example before the erring one. And you, dear sisters, who have stingy husbands, were you saving with the weekly wages? Did you offer any encouragement to the hard-working man or did frippery and finery, and the many things that delight the heart of a woman, take the bulk of the pay envelope? I always loved pretty clothes, etc., but my dear father died while I was in school. I worked, earned fair wages, but never saw the time when I could spend my money for foolish, girlish knickknacks. No one hindered, but I had a poor, tired little mother that I felt it my duty to share with and now that I am hundreds of miles away from her, I can thank God that I did what I could for her while I was in the old home. The way taught me to be a partner with my husband. The weekly pay is brought to me, not at my request but because he trusts me and knows I will care for it. We have a lovely little home, and to "Sally Ann" of Illinois, I will say that "the little grey home" is all that I dreamed it would be, of every comfort, plenty to eat and something laid by for a rainy day. I am happier than I ever thought it possible to be and there is only one regret and that is that when hubby is at work during the day I cannot have a little chat with mother and loved ones at home, for I do miss them all. I am doing what I can to help those around me that are in distress and think, "What if it were little mother." God grant that someone will stand by her while I am away.

We have started life together, Hubby and I, and we mean to live and devote our lives and time to God and each other and when night falls, and before we retire, we kneel with arms around each other and thank God that we are together and for the faith and trust we have in each other. No matter what misfortune comes, so long as you breathe the Holy name of Jesus and keep Him by you, you can conquer the most dangerous foe.

I will bring this to a close by saying, sisters, for your own and your husbands' sakes, lead a pure, true life and let the world know that so far as men are concerned, there is only one to be loved and interested in and that is your husband. For, after all, men are just big babies, and a loving word and a caress, a kiss of greeting, will go a long way toward keeping hubby home evenings. Try it and see, and please pardon me if I have offended any.

With love and best wishes, MRS. C. A. M.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Will you please print my letter in the Sisters' Corner? So much good advice is given to those, who ask for it, that I am writing hoping you and the sisters will help me. My letter may seem silly and insignificant, but really, the answers I get will mean much to me and I hope Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters will give me their views.

When I was fifteen years old, my mother was sick and I overheard some ladies talking, and they said that her life was in great danger; I was so frightened I thought my mother would surely die. I prayed to God to let her live, that if He would save her, I would never get married, but stay at home and care for her always. My mother got well, and is living now; that was eight years ago. I think I have kept my promise. So far I have given up all the good times a girl likes, and have stayed at home and done nearly all the work that is to be done where there is a large family. I never had any friends, neither girls nor boys. I never went to a party or talked to a boy five minutes in my life. I want friends, and I cannot make them at all. It is seldom I see any young people with whom to make friends, as I never go where they are. The only time I meet any one is some of my younger sister's friends and that is very seldom. I am getting away off my subject. I would like to talk to you all and ask so much. I make it a habit to ask my mother what I want to know, but there are some things I can't ask her and this letter deals with one of them. One thing I am most anxious to know about is this: Do you think that the Lord would hold me to that promise? I have prayed to be forgiven for it, but I do not know whether I am or not. I try to be a Christian but I guess I am not good enough to know if my prayer is answered. Won't the sisters tell me what they think?

Do you think it silly to want young men and women friends? No one seems to think I want to go with young people. I have been at home so long, I really feel backward and bashful. When I do happen to get with a person I am miserable. I am not pretty, neither so ugly that I am repulsive. I try to do the right thing but I cannot make friends. No one wants my friendship and I want theirs so much. I have never been able to dress pretty because I did not have it to dress with. I do not mind doing the work at home for I think it every girl's place to help. I do most of the work, besides caring for the children as if they were my own. My parents are good to me, in a way; papa doesn't think I want to go anywhere and mamma tells me to go with my sister sometimes (I never tell her how much I want to go but I guess she just knows). My sister treats me as though I were ten and crazy at that; she is eighteen and I am twenty-four. She is the pet of the town. I am not jealous of her. I would rather she would have the friends than I, but I do not think she should treat me so and especially in company. Can you give me any suggestions so I can get out of the rut and over being so sensitive?

Please answer my letter through COMFORT. Although I would enjoy receiving letters, I would rather not because I do not wish any one to know that I have written it. No one knows I ever made such a promise as I have never told it and no one knows how lonely I am for friends.

Won't C. A. M. of Nebraska, who wrote in answer to A Motherless Girl, give me her views? I enjoyed her letter.

I will greatly appreciate any advice given, more than I can tell. MILLY.

ORANGEBURG, N. Y.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been reading how you visited Uncle Charlie and Miss Fischer. And I envy you. It would be pleasant to visit Uncle for I live scarcely twenty-five miles away and possess a couple of letters that came from "Maria" several years ago. But I know it is a tax on his feeble strength to see so many people and I'm cursed with a silent tongue in most strange places, especially in a sick room.

Some time ago my name appeared under letters in the Corner and the C. L. O. C. and I wish to thank everyone for their kindness even if some of the letters had to go unanswered. Since then I've lost a dear "mother-comrade" and changed my residence from Rose Cottage to the beautiful old stone house next door to where mother was born. It came to my sister and me after mother's death and we knew she would be glad. The house was built in 1752 and for seven generations it has come from father to son or to daughter and now from cousin to cousins but always into hands of a descendant of the original Dutch farmer. This is historic country where Major Andre was executed and history made so long ago. So, even if the once big farm is cut and sold, there's a touch one can't quite forget in the old homestead. It has been changed very little except as to comforts of running water and a telephone. The latter was my addition for grandmother is old and my work takes me out several hours a day. My sister lives in the next town with her uncle to be near her work.

I wish, Mrs. Wilkinson, you could have come out here, too. Better luck next time. Perhaps editorial

Alone with Her Conscience

By Isabel Gordon Curtis

Text—I know of the future judgment,
How dreadful soe'er it be,
That to sit alone with my conscience
Will be judgment enough for me.
—Clifford Lanier.

A HUSBAND and wife walked home together one afternoon from a church wedding where the daughter of an old friend had been the bride. It was not a pretentious wedding. The girl's father was a kindly, upright, old business man, who had more friends than money. While he gazed down at the beautiful girl clinging to his arm, his face had glowed with love and pride. She was as fair, as sweet, as beloved a bride as the sun ever shone on. His eyes had turned from her to smile in happy confidence at the tall young bridegroom who waited at the altar. He was deserving of the girl, who had grown up in the old town from babyhood to a gentle, generous womanhood, which gladdened hearts and won love wherever she went.

On their way home the elderly couple gossiped as wedding guests do of the lovely bride, of her stalwart young husband and of what the future held for them. Suddenly the wife asked:

"Did you notice a woman there who seemed shaken by grief? She was not among the guests, she wore deep mourning and sat in a far-away corner under the gallery."

"How did she look?" asked the husband, curiously.

"I never saw such sorrow in a human face, such longing, such starvation for love, or such loneliness as filled the dark, sad eyes. She sat gazing at the bridal party as if there was no one else in the church. Then she caught my eye, dropped her veil and bowed her head in her hands."

"It was the bride's mother," said the man slowly.

"The bride's mother, William; why, she died when Miriam was an infant!"

"She did not die." The old lawyer spoke slowly. "Long before I met you, when I lived in California, her family and ours were close friends. It was my eyes she met, when she dropped her veil. She recognized me. She was one of the most beautiful girls I ever knew. I was a guest at her wedding, she and David were poor in those days. They went straight to a little home he had furnished with much love and pride. A year later came a baby, the girl who was married today. One night, when Miriam was five months old, David went home, to find a note lying on the table beside the sleeping infant. His wife did not try to exculpate herself, she did not ask forgiveness or throw herself on his mercy, she merely said that after a terrible battle between her heart and her conscience, she had gone away with a man, whom she loved devotedly. David came to me heartbroken. I adjusted affairs for him before I came East. Later he moved here and started life all over again. We let the child and the world, when it chose to ask questions, think that the mother was dead. I am the only one here, who knows what happened twenty-six years ago."

"Who is the woman?" asked his wife.

"You do not recognize her from pictures you have seen?"

"She is the widow of Broughton, the millionaire who died a few months ago."

"Oh," she cried, for back to her memory thronged a pageant of a funeral, a magnificent place on the Hudson, and a mansion on Fifth Avenue, which held one of the finest picture galleries in America. They all belonged to one woman, a lonely, childish woman, who had loved her husband so, the papers told, that she was grieving herself to death in her vast, splendid homes. She was a woman of large charities but with few friends, and the wealth, which seemed to pile up before her as by a miracle, failed to bring happiness."

"Can you imagine," asked the lawyer's wife slowly, "what the woman's thoughts were today, as she sat among curious-eyed strangers, not even an invited guest at the wedding of her own child?"

"I cannot," answered the man gravely. "It seemed to me, while I watched her, that nobody could fathom those thoughts except—God and her own conscience."

More About Our Hair

NEXT to putting on pounds where pounds are needed, and taking off pounds where pounds are too plentiful, it seems to me that my girls, big and little, old and young, maidens and brides and "old married folks," are most interested in the hair. So let's talk about it a little once more.

You all know how I believe you should shampoo your hair—with a liquid shampoo made by shaving half a bar of white soap into a quart of boiling water, thoroughly dissolving over the fire, then cooling. And you are fully aware that I believe you should shampoo your hair, if naturally oily, once in two weeks, and if dry once in three or four weeks. Because your scalp must be kept clean, if your hair is to be healthy.

Massaging the scalp is one other method good for all hair alike, for it keeps the scalp loose on the skull, allows the blood to circulate and stimulates the little hair cells.

PASS YOUR BRUSH ACROSS IT A COUPLE OF TIMES.

But, with all this, you have to do more. You have, first of all, to feed your body well, see that all impurities are carried away daily, that the skin is kept clean, the pores open, that you are rested and mentally undisturbed. Seems funny, doesn't it, that all these things affect the hair? But not funny, either, when one realizes that hair is a part of the body, and we are all willing to admit that we can't confine the ills of the body to definite localities; if we have anything the matter with us, the whole body suffers.

Pretty hair is a real beauty, and all that we can do to make it glossy, lustrous, healthy, abundant, is well worth doing. Each month I tell you in my "Answers to Questions" different ways to secure all these things. But besides the things which have to do with the health of the hair, there are lots of little "tricks of the toilet" well worth practicing, because they lend some little added attraction.

For instance none of us uses strong perfumes, because we have been taught that this is not in good taste: but we do like a faint fragrance to cling round us. How to obtain it, is the question. Sachet pads laid among our clothes leave fragrance behind, but here is something else we can do to advantage. Get from our druggist a tiny bit of oil of geranium or some other perfume in oil form—which means in the most condensed and strongest form. You need not get more than half an ounce—or even less if the druggist will sell it. Keep it in a little vial on your dressing table, and every time you dress your hair, after you have brushed out the dust, and combed out the snarls, and it is all ready to put up, put just a drop of the perfume in the palm of your hand and pass your spotlessly clean brush across it, back and forth, a couple of times. Then brush your hair with it. There's your fragrance, girls!

By the way, in brushing your hair, do you brush back from the ears, I wonder? Don't do it any more. By brushing back from the forehead or from the ears, you wear away the hairs and make your forehead higher. Brush down, not back, from the part, on each side. That will mean brushing down over your ears instead of back away from them. It helps!

Answers to Questions

WILLORD.—Yes, you weigh altogether too little for your height; you are forty or fifty pounds below weight, and that is why your hair is brittle and scanty—it isn't nourished enough. And your skin is sallow for the same reason. You must get to work and build yourself up to 140 or 150 pounds. Read last month's COMFORT and see what I said to "Working Girl" about the kinds of food that would make her gain in weight, and the way she ought to live. Follow these directions, and see that you drink plenty of water and have enough sleep at night—eight or nine hours. Choosing foods that make fat will build up your weight; and letting alone those which are not easily digestible—such as pork, veal, pastries, greasy foods, fried foods—will do even still more. Good luck!

A BRUNETTE.—Don't use soap on your face, nor hot water—that is the first thing you need to keep in mind, if your skin is rough and the pores large. When I say don't use soap, I mean do not rub soap on the skin, and do not even use it in the water more than once a day. At night wash the face with warm soapy water, then rinse many times in warm water, and finally in cool, and last in cold. This will close the pores. A good cream can be rubbed well into the face, after it is thoroughly dry. Do not use much cream—just a little, but massage it in. In the morning wash the face with tepid water, and dash cold water on it at last. Do this at any other time in the day that it needs freshening up, but don't wash just for the sake of washing. You should take an all-over bath every day of your life. Stand on a folded bathtowel if you have no tub, and briskly cleanse one portion of the body at a time, rinse and dry. Do this before you go to bed at night, and, as a matter of fact, it would be a fine thing for your skin, if, besides, on rising in the morning, you would sponge off the body quickly with a cloth wet in cold water. It only takes a minute and you start the day fresh and clean. When you are not feeling well, you should not use cold water.

TOUGH HANDS.—Try the hand lotion and other directions I gave in the last issue of COMFORT. There is no liquid I can recommend to "peel off" the skin of the hands, as you suggest, but it will soften and whiten under proper treatment. See what I said to "A. G. M." in last issue. About the "crow's-feet" and the verticle wrinkles on the forehead. It is possible there is something wrong with your eyes and that you therefore frown in an attempt to focus them. Massage will not keep away wrinkles if the habit of frowning is continued. If it is merely a habit with no reason, then you must train yourself to keep your brow calm. To massage these wrinkles, dip the fingers lightly in cold cream, then with the two forefingers, one just above the other, massage across the verticle wrinkles. Start at the top of the wrinkle, and massaging in this way come all the way down; then repeat. A rotary motion with the tips of the fingers is the correct one to use on the temples and for crow's-feet. Any good massage or face cream will do. I am sorry I cannot recommend any in these columns, as that is against the rules.

ELK.—At sixteen, I shouldn't use face powder, or, if I did, only a very tiny bit on the end of my nose or wherever else I happened to be really shiny. You still have "the bloom of youth" and ought not to cover it up. You should weigh more; one hundred pounds for five feet two is too little. See my answer to "Willord." Your hands, which you say are too large compared with the size of your arms, are probably in perfect proportion only your arms are a little too thin because you are below weight. Whatever you do to build yourself up will take care of this question, too. If your hands are "always red," the reason is probably either that you are wearing clothes that are too tight—corsets, shoes, waistbands, collars, sleeves—and so your circulation is interfered with; or else you use too much soap too frequently on them and roughen and redden the skin. I gave some good advice to "A. G. M." in last month's COMFORT. Read and follow it, won't you? I shouldn't use a hair tonic at present on my hair, but build up my weight. Hair will fall out if it is not receiving proper nourishment, and since you are below weight it can't be properly nourished. So get to work and add those necessary pounds!

IOWA.—I wonder if you read last month's Pretty Girls' Club? One young girl was very disconsolate indeed because her bust was so slim, and now here you come with a bust too large. It is a little too large, my dear, but I am inclined to think it will reduce as you get older, and that by the time you are eighteen it will be at least two inches smaller and perhaps more. Along about sixteen, the figure is not normal; there are many changes taking place in the body, and in many girls the bust is one of the parts of the body to feel the changes most. Don't rub the bust in an attempt to reduce it—indeed, handle it as little as possible. Splashing cold water on the bust and chest has a firming effect but not a reducing one. Wearing a strip of rubber cloth bound about the bust and fastened with adhesive tape that it may be firm and tight, induces perspiration and therefore is apt to break down some of the fat; but it is quite uncomfortable, and for what I believe is only a temporary condition with you, I hardly think it worth while to bear the discomfort. Lead a sensible life—with much outdoor exercise—avoid too many love stories and too much thought of that side of life, for, strange as it may seem, the various parts of the body are pretty closely connected and a feverish sort of mental attitude might have a good deal to do with making a large bust. Funny, isn't it? Do you play tennis? Do you swim? If you have any opportunity for either of these sports, take it, for both require exercise with the arms, and arm exercises will help to reduce your large bust, just as it helps to develop a thin bust. I gave a good arm exercise in last month's COMFORT.

SHERIDAN.—You do not give me the size of your bust, but first let me say that you are a little over weight, in any case, for your height. Why not cut down on your diet a little? Go a little slow on potatoes and sweet things, for instance, and be sure not to eat between meals, and perhaps eat just a little less at every meal. Try it. About your bust, I quite appreciate the trouble of wearing a brassiere when it must be worn so tight. One good way of keeping a large bust firm, without wearing the kind of brassiere which has straps over the shoulder and so cuts into the flesh, is to have a corset-cover made of heavy drilling, very tight. The arm size goes over the shoulder, and there is no strap, though the front of the corset-cover can be cut as low as one desires. Buttoned up the front, it holds the bust perfectly firm, and while it is as warm as one more article of clothing naturally would be, it doesn't tire the shoulders. Remember, it must be heavy, firm material. Now, about reducing: I suggest you try the rubber band I mention in answering "Iowa" above. It is uncomfortable, but it helps. It should be cut wide enough to extend above and below the bust, and should be wrapped firmly about the body below the arms, and held in place with strips of adhesive tape. Keep it on and perspire! Another thing which might help is to dissolve Epsom salts in cool water and bathe the breast with the solution. It is astringent in quality. I am sorry there is no short cut to reduction of the bust.

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Full directions for making and use come in each box of Barbo Compound. It will gradually darken streaked, faded gray hair, and make it soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy, and does not rub off.—Advt.

Your Hair Needs Danderine

Save your hair and double its beauty. You can have lots of long, thick, strong, lustrous hair. Don't let it stay lifeless, thin, scraggly or fading. Bring back its color, vigor and vitality. Get a 35-cent bottle of delightful "Danderine" at any drug or toilet counter to freshen your scalp; check dandruff and falling hair. Your hair needs stimulating, beautifying "Danderine" to restore its life, color, brightness, abundance. Hurry, Girls!

Be Careful What You Wash Your Hair With

Most soaps and prepared shampoos contain too much alkali, which is very injurious, as it dries the scalp and makes the hair brittle.

The best thing to use is Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo, for this is pure and entirely greaseless. It's very cheap and beats anything else all to pieces. You can get this at any drug store, and a few ounces will last the whole family for months.

Simply moisten the hair with water and rub it in, about a teaspoonful is all that is required. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, cleanses thoroughly, and rinses out easily. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and is soft, fresh looking, bright, fluffy, wavy, and easy to to handle. Besides, it loosens and takes out every particle of dust, dirt and dandruff.

Rose-Glo Complexion Cream leaves a wonderful rose glow upon the cheeks.

Rose-Glo is an entirely new scientific vanishing cream which nourishes, protects and beautifies the skin—prevents unsightly blotches, blackheads, chapping and keeps the dust from the pores.

It takes but a moment to apply leaving the skin soft and velvety and produces a wonderfully healthy pink glow upon the cheeks.

The face can be easily powdered after using Rose-Glo as it holds powder firmly until washed off.

Beware of cheap creams for the face as they may ruin your complexion.

Sold only by the manufacturers in large $1.00 tubes.

Ferns, Palms and Pines to Brighten Your Home

By H. G. Wentworth

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

ALL ferns are not easy to grow. The Boston and other sword ferns can be managed by the average housewife without difficulty however, the glossy holly fern thriving with ordinary care. Maidenhair ferns are also popular, but the kind which the florist usually displays is not the kind for the amateur to choose. The hardy Farkeyense is the variety to select for house culture, and it is most important that it should never be allowed to dry out. If this should happen, the plant may as well be retired for the season. Fern balls from the Orient are highly decorative when suspended from the ceiling or the top of a window, provided they are well-grown specimens. The fern balls often seen are far from ornamental, but usually because the owners do not know how to care for them.

Fern balls should not be exposed to the rays of the sun, a point overlooked by most housekeepers who try to grow them. When the ball is to be started into growth, it should be soaked for several hours, being completely covered with water and afterward hung in a warm room. This treatment must be continued every second day until the plant begins to grow, and after that it must be watered often. The best way to give water until the plant becomes too large is to put it into a pail or tub of lukewarm water. It takes from one to four weeks to get a fern ball well established.

RUBBER PLANT.

Most ferns do not thrive in low temperatures, so that it is not advisable to attempt growing them unless the temperature of the room can be kept up to fifty-five degrees at night. Ordinary living-room heat is right for the daytime. A light window which receives little direct sunlight satisfies ferns better than any other situation. A rather light soil is preferred. Over-watering is a common mistake, and yet the soil must never be allowed to dry out. Some people seem to know by instinct just how much water to give plants while others must learn by experience.

If the room is dry and warm, as those heated by steam or furnace are likely to be, it is well to set the pot in a large jardiniere and pack moss around it. If the red spider gives trouble—and he is a most common pest—the leaves may be sprayed with water by means of an atomizer, care being taken to drive the water against the under side of the leaves with considerable force.

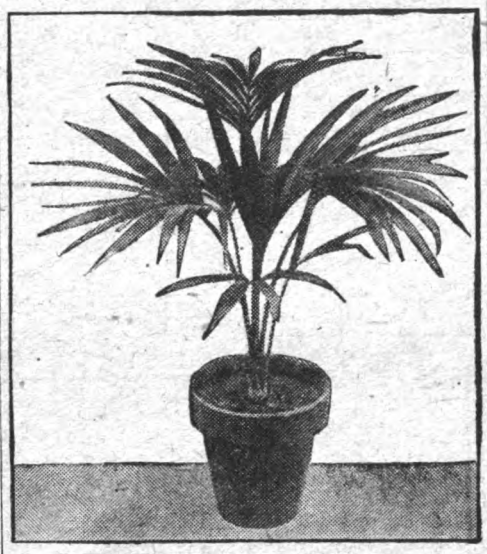
Of the palms, the two most safely recommended are the curly and the thatched-leaf, both being known as Kentia palms. Although very much alike, the former is more erect in form, the thatch-leaf variety having a drooping habit. These palms are highly decorative and very easily grown. A north window satisfies them and they will thrive in the conditions to be found in the average living-room—conditions not at all conducive to the health of plants in general, on account of gas and lack of ventilation. Although requiring only a moderate amount of water, they must not be neglected and it is advisable to sponge off the leaves once a week to remove the dust which is sure to accumulate there.

The India rubber plant is found everywhere. While possibly less ornamental than the graceful ferns and palms, it makes a fine show and thrives where many other plants would not survive a month. It needs good soil to start with and plenty of water, for it takes up moisture very rapidly, especially if the plant is a large one.

In spite of the rubber plant's possibilities, many specimens are not decorative to any degree, simply through lack of training. Left to itself, a plant is likely to become "leggy," to use a florist's phrase, and top heavy. If taken in hand when small, and the terminals pinched off as necessary, the plant may be grown into a very attractive specimen.

If a rubber plant gets too much water, some of the leaves will turn yellow and drop off. Much less water is needed when the plant is resting than when it is making vigorous and rapid growth. If the growth seems to be unsatisfactory, the application of manure water about the color of weak tea once a week will help to start it growing.

Being very large, the leaves of the rubber plant need to be sponged off frequently. The dustless dustcloth, which most housekeepers use nowadays, is excellent for this purpose, but the use of milk or oil is a mistake. These things may make the leaves shine like polished furniture at first, but the grease adhering to the leaves causes them to catch more dirt and dust than before, the pores becoming clogged.



Rubber plants grow rather rapidly, often becoming so large within a few years as to be little less than a nuisance. This condition is easily remedied, however. The plant may be cut off two feet above the pot, after which it will throw out side shoots and soon assume the appearance of quite a different plant.

To divide the plant so as to have too small specimens instead of a single large one is easily done. First secure some spagnum moss of the florist around the corner. Then select a point on the stem of the plant some distance from the top, having in mind that the portion cut off will make another plant. Then make a slanting cut in the stem at this point, slip a sliver of wood into the opening and tie some damp moss around it. The moss must be kept moist but not wet for two or three weeks, or until roots are seen coming through the moss. Continue for a few days longer until a mass of roots has been formed. Then cut the stem off below the new roots and pot the new plant, putting the moss into the soil with the roots, as it cannot be easily disentangled. This is a very simple way of securing a new rubber plant.

If it is ever necessary to cut out a branch which is in the way, or if a leaf is knocked off and bleeding follows, it is a good plan to cut a small potato in halves, scoop out a little of one half and bind the hollowed part over the wound.

The Norfolk Island pine resembles a perfect little evergreen transplanted from the woodland and is highly decorative. It is very easy to grow, provided it is not given an over-abundance of dry heat. The soil should be kept moist but by no means wet, and frequent showering or spraying must not be overlooked. Some people fail to realize that the red spider attacks this as well as other household favorites and so neglect their pines until this pest has been at work for some time. When summer comes it is advisable to sink the potted plant in the garden in a shaded place. Frequent applications of water must not be forgotten if the season is dry.

Probably the aspidistra is the easiest of all decorative house plants to grow. If something which will endure neglect and flourish in spite of adverse conditions is wanted, the aspidistra is by all means the plant to choose. If a plant is needed for a window into which the sun never shines, or for a room in which there are wide variations in temperature, let the aspidistra be selected.

KENTIA PALM—CURLY.

Unlike most plants, the aspidistra has no stem, the leaves—blade-like in shape—springing directly from the root stalk. Often these leaves are two feet long and several inches wide. In some varieties they are green, in others variegated. Perhaps the variegated sorts are the most pleasing.

The strong, rapid growth of the aspidistra is a source of satisfaction to the plant lover, but when the plant becomes too large it can be divided with the greatest ease, it being necessary only to divide the root ball with a sharp knife. Probably February is the best time to make this separation, for then the plant will be making but little growth.

Another good decorative plant is the screw pine, which finds favor particularly with people who like variegated foliage. The graceful green leaves have wide white stripes lengthwise and are set with spines. New plants are secured by the simple method of potting the suckers, which appear in considerable numbers.

ASPHIDISTRA.

Although smaller than the plants mentioned, the Rex Begonia should surely have a place among the decorative plants for the house. There are several varieties and the broad, heart-shaped leaves are richly ornamental. Given plenty of rich soil they are very easily grown.

Decorative plants for the dining-table must needs be small and dainty. A simple centerpiece consisting of asparagus plumosus, with a few low-growing ferns grouped around it, is distinctly ornamental if the plants are kept in good condition. In fact, the asparagus fern grown alone is highly pleasing, for the delicate, feather-like foliage is very beautiful. The plant is thrifty and not hard to grow.

The tiny partridge berry grown in a finger bowl, with another bowl inverted over it, makes a table ornament not to be despised. Rich soil, preferably with a little leaf mold added, is needed, but water will not be required oftener than once a week so long as the plant is kept covered.

If plants for the dining-table are purchased of the florist in winter, he should be asked to harden them off for a week or ten days before they are taken home. Then they will be much more likely to live. Moving delicate ferns from the humid atmosphere of a greenhouse to the dry, hot air of the ordinary dining-room is a pretty severe shock.

The dish for these plants should always be at least two and a half inches deep, with straight sides. If the florist fills it, he will use the right kind of soil, as a matter of course, otherwise it is well to buy a few cents' worth of potting soil. If this is not feasible, a good substitute may be found by digging up a few sods and scraping off the turfy substance found on the bottom, mixing it with good garden soil.

The dining-table ferns seldom get sufficient light if allowed to remain on the table all the time. A better practise is to move them to a window between meals, without exposing them to a great amount of strong sunlight, and occasionally the foliage should be taken to the bathroom and given a thorough spraying.

As a rule, the decorative plants named require less attention than a window full of flowering plants, and are recommended to housekeepers who have but little time to give plants and yet love them.

vacations, like railroad vacations, are merely aggravations—so brief. Mine at any rate are a minus quantity.

It will not do to talk much longer. I'm only twenty-three, not much for size and it's hard to say which is the worst,—to see me or hear me. There's no comment to be made on all the nice letters, only I don't see why Helen Rasmussen doesn't speak out loud once.

Sincerely, (MISS) EDNA COUTANT.

Edna.—You aren't half as sorry as I am that I couldn't visit you for aside from the pleasure of knowing you I'd have enjoyed your home so much. I can almost see it now as I love interesting old places. Come again.—Ed.

TOMPKINS, BOX 149, SASK.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Will you allow a sister from far-off Saskatchewan a little room in your corner?

"COMFORT" was a welcome guest in my father's home when I was a little child. Many years have passed since then but upon renewing my acquaintance with it lately, I find it still true to its name. The "Sisters' Corner" is splendid and I love to think of the good done by the League Shut-in and Mercy Work Department.

If this should meet the eyes of any sister (or brother) who knew Wm. M. Dail of Ozawkee, Kansas, I would be much pleased to hear from them. We left there when I was but nine years of age, but the memories of my childhood's home and the little playmates I had, are pleasant ones.

Are any of the sisters familiar with the "Decker Educational Cards?" They are very instructive for young and old and I would like to know where they can be obtained. If any one knows and would send me the address I would be grateful.

If we can be improving our minds at the same time that we are amusing ourselves, it seems to me it is much better than spending hours in pleasures which leave us no richer in knowledge, and, what is worse, they may leave an influence, which, in the cases of some, will lead only to ruin. What a wonderfully solemn thing is this thought of influence!

"The smallest bark on life's tumultuous ocean
Will leave a track behind forevermore;
The lightest wave of influence set in motion
Strengthens and widens to the eternal shore."

And:

"We change by beholding the lives that are fair,
By Providence sometimes thrown round us;
We love them the more because they are rare,
Like the perfume of flowers that has found us."

Dear sisters, shall we not seek to live, by God's help, in such a way that any one who is morally lost may not be able to point at us and say, "It is because of your influence that I am here."

With love and best wishes from

Your Northwestern Sister,
ALPHA D. ARMENEAU.

WALHALLA, N. DAK.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS AND BROTHERS:

I always think of you, Mrs. Wilkinson, as one of the sisters, so I need not address you separately. Although I have read COMFORT for nearly as long as I can remember, this is my first letter to the sisters. As so many of them describe themselves, I will do likewise: I weigh one hundred and thirty pounds, five feet, four inches tall, with dark brown hair and eyes and am twenty-one years of age. I am a farmer's wife and am endeavoring to raise our little son, Cecil Raymond, to be as healthy and happy as lots of fresh air and exercise can make him. He is now a year and eight months old.

Before going any further I want to ask the sisters if they have ever tried making dust caps for their children, to keep their hair from becoming sunburned? They are very simple to make—just a round piece of cloth (I use percale) and drawn in with a string or elastic. They are no trouble and I consider them indispensable. My boy never thinks of going out of doors without asking for his cap.

Many of the letters give advice as to the care of children. This is very hard to give as hardly two children have the same disposition. I do not believe in harsh punishment, although I think some parents are too indulgent. I like, above all else, to see obedience in children. The best way to accomplish this is to study the character and temperament of the child, and find out the right way of going about it. One fault so many have is being strict to start with and in the end letting the child have his own way. If you say one thing stick to it and soon the child will learn that you mean what you say; then there will be no misunderstanding. I agree with Mrs. Farley when she says children should be taught to save. My little boy has a savings bank but as yet he is too young to know the value of money.

The Sisters' Corner was always interesting but I think you will all agree with me when I say that it is more so since the gentlemen have called on us. Even though Bachelor Bill is very sarcastic, he has some good ideas. We all know it is very disagreeable, not to say embarrassing, to have to ask our husbands for money when we need it. I do not complain, however, because my husband and I take turns handling the purse.

I am sure we are pleased to have you come in for a chat, Mr. Garrison, and we will be glad to have you call again if you will. Your letter was so full of truth and sympathy, and surely Bertha Curtis, as well as some of the rest of us will be able to take Life and her queer capers more cheerfully.

Bonnie Bovell, I quite agree with you on the subject of discussing our husband's faults. We would not like to have the tables turned, and I must say that some husbands have the most provocation.

I hope some of the sisters will write me.

My love to you all, MRS. W. R. FITZSIMONDS.

ADRIAN, MICH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I enjoy COMFORT very much and have taken it over twenty years, and I especially enjoy the sisters' letters that tell of their homes and children. The brothers' letters are interesting also.

I sympathize with all who have lost little ones as after being married seven years a dear little son came to our home but he stayed only a few short hours. That was three years ago and last April another dear little son came to gladden our home. He is a fresh air and water baby and weighed seven pounds at birth and 14 pounds at four months. He is very good natured and has never been sick or had the colic. Am sending his photograph, taken the day he was two months old.

TAKEN WHEN HE WAS TWO MONTHS OLD.

I've never seen a letter written from Adrian, although I know it comes to a great many homes here. Adrian is a factory town of about 14,000 inhabitants.

PART ONE.

ROY Hodge was a very ordinary young man till he met Theo. True, he held a diploma from the State University and a license to practice law; yet he was a young man without a path in life, without a landmark or a goal-post. Old Hodge, who was only a cotton farmer, had put up the money for Roy's education as he had for his other sons, but when Roy was once out of school he had refused to advance another cent. So Roy had returned here to Pecan, had taken over a little vacant store and hung out a tin sign, Roy Hodge, Attorney At Law. But Roy had by day just three occupations. He played checkers, he read popular fiction, and he fished. By night his occupations were said to be more shady. More than one poker club in Centralia knew him for a successful player; and it was told of him that he was not above sitting on the pine straw by a pitch pine fire and throwing dice with negroes and poor whites. Sorry? Yes, that is the word that described Roy in those days—he was sorry. And soon he lost the sense of pride even in his dress. His hat went to seed; his best suit became threadbare, and his collars and cuffs sadly frayed.

Then to our town came Theodosia Byrrell—you pronounce it with the accent on the last syllable. No one who saw Miss Byrrell would have thought of putting it on the first. Theo came to our school as the music teacher, and on Thursday night before the school was to open she gave a little concert in the school auditorium. I shall never forget how the girl looked. She was beautiful with a sort of Celtic beauty,—the blackest of raven black hair, deep, liquid eyes, and such a neck and head, such shoulders and such a poise! Please do not think she was of the Spanish or Italian type. She was Irish with a dash of French; but she was more than that—she was one of those rare stars that rise in an American community once in every two or three generations. She came here from a little college town in Mississippi, and her family were—well, we have a saying here in the South that people are "folks" or they are not "folks." Her people were certainly "folks."

She played the violin for us that night; and she wore a dress with pointed sleeves that opened just below the elbow, and to the bottom point of each sleeve hung a bangle. As she moved the bow to the music those bangles swayed and glittered in the lamplight. Also she wore upon her forehead a little affair like the lavaliers that ladies wear at the throat, and as she moved her head to music the central brilliant of that brow piece gleamed and flashed. We are simple country people here in Pecan, and I am sure she seemed to every one in the audience almost like a creature from another world.

And then she was so gracious. You know graciousness is the true precipitate of a good family and a clean heart.

I had come home and gone to bed and was just dozing off to the sound of Schubert's Serenade, which still rang in my ears, when I heard a knock at the door.

"Dr. Elgin, are you in bed?" called a voice. It was the voice of Roy Hodge.

"Yes, I've just lain down; but come in, Roy," I answered. . .

My medicine shop was just next to Roy's office, and we were rather good friends. I had seen the boy grow from the knee breeches age, and my heart went out to him in spite of his sorriness. I got up and lighted a lamp and he came on into my bachelor quarters and flung himself into a chair. As he lighted a cigarette his hand trembled as if he had been drinking heavily.

"Dr. Elgin," he said. "I've decided to leave Pecan for good and I want you to do something for me,—lend me fifty dollars."

"What's up, Roy?" I asked. "Are you in trouble?" I knew that playing dice with the negroes was a dangerous pastime, and I had not seen Roy at the concert that night.

"No, I'm not in trouble," he said slowly; "I'm going to Centralia to make good. I need fifty dollars to get me some decent clothes. If I should go to Dad for it he'd think I was just going over there to gamble—Doctor, if you'll let me have this money I'll give you my word of honor I'll not touch another dice, card or drink of liquor this year."

I wrote him a check and laid it upon the table between us.

"Now what is your plan?" I asked.

"I'm going to Mrs. Manley's to board."

"Good."

"I'm going to try to get a Monday job collecting weekly bills."

"Good."

"I'm going to try to get two or three fire insurance agencies."

"Fine."

"And later I'm going to try to get a desk in Judge Hanby's law office."

"That's fine—does the smell of liquor bother you?"

"Yes."

"Well, stay off Broussard Street except when you absolutely have to go there, and then go on business and come away at once. And listen, when you get to feeling that you just can't get over the hours from supper to bedtime, hop on a train and run out here, and I'll play checkers with you till time for the ten-thirty back to Centralia. If the feeling is still too strong for you I'll let you bunk with me and go back to town in the morning."

"Thank you, Doctor," said Roy, with tears in his eyes. His cigarette had gone out just after he lighted it, and he threw it into a corner without relighting it. "I must go home and pack," he said; "I'll be off early in the morning."

As he reached the door it occurred to me that he had been to the concert after all.

"Were you at the concert tonight, Roy?" I asked.

"Yes," he answered shortly and disappeared into the darkness.

A month later a well-dressed young man stepped off the afternoon train from Centralia. There was no droop to this person's shoulders and no slouch to his gait. His complexion was good and his eye clear. I should not have recognized him at any distance as Roy Hodge. He came directly to my office and sat down for a talk.

"How are you making it?" I queried.

"Just squeezed through this month. I have paid my board and have a return ticket to Centralia, and it's only three days till Monday and collections."

"That's fine!" I said. "And the dice and cards?"

"Don't touch 'em."

"And the drink?"

"Don't touch it either."

"Well, listen then, I'm going to take you into the swamp after bears next week. You're about due to have some excitement or you'll blow off a cap. Do the lights and movement bother you much at night?"

"God!" he said, and bit his under lip. Then he added: "There's a damned jazz band, and a good one, too, at Looney's beer garden. I can hear it every night and I can see the heads of the people when they stand up or walk about."

"You'll have to move your boarding place," I advised. "But come on now and take supper with me at Mrs. Hargreave's. Three of the teachers are boarding there."

I could see the young man start with eagerness.

"Who are the three?" he asked in a low voice.

"Two of them are Miss Hecklar and Miss Rose—you know those two; and the other is the new music teacher, Miss Byrrell."

At supper that night two of the teachers feigned headaches. As we sat down to table I heard Miss Hecklar say to Mrs. Hargreave: "You know what he is—what an awful reputation he has!" and I could see poor Hodge turn pale and look as though he could fly from the spot.

But Theo was graciousness itself, as I knew beforehand she would be. And the two talked interestingly. The talk ran on Tennyson and the music of Tennyson's verse. Roy said he did not see why some one had not set more of Tennyson to music, and then he quoted:

"The torrent brooks of hallowed Israel
Through craggy hollows pouring late and soon,
Sound all night long in pouring through the dell,
Far heard beneath the moon—far heard beneath the moon!"

And Miss Byrrell, acting upon an impulse, got up and took her violin and began to play. She played a little introduction that as like water falling over craggy cliffs, and then nodded brightly to Roy, and in a clear baritone, following the lead of the violin, he sang. I saw at once that here were met two kindred souls; and of a sudden I suffered a pang of regret for my lost youth. There are moments when a bachelor of middle age would commit murder to gain his young manhood back again.

The next morning there was an acrimonious discussion at our breakfast table. Miss Hecklar, who spent her days expounding the three methods of eliminating Y from an algebraic equation and her nights dreaming of a time when she should be principal of our school, was of the opinion that Roy Hodge was a loafer and a scalawag; and the fact that he could sing a little was nothing in his favor—she didn't think much of music anyway. Miss Rose elevated her chin and tossed her blond head and said she had nothing to say against the young man, because she knew that tastes differed.

When every one else had had a rather lengthy say, Theo added cryptically: "A one is just a unit; but write some other figure after it, and you have a number, even though the number be thirteen."

That afternoon she said to me with tears in her pretty eyes: "If I had to spend many moons with just those two and with some of the others like them over there at school, I should want to put on scarlet tights and walk a slack rope over Niagara, or drink a dozen cocktails or do something equally desperate."

During the winter Roy came out once or twice a month; and when he came he always brought headaches for Misses Rose and Hecklar, but he often brought candy or roses for Miss Byrrell. Even an old bachelor like myself could see that the friendship between them was rapidly ripening into something more intimate. And the people of Pecan, with that ready charity that is so willing to boost any one who is trying to get on, began to say that there was a good deal more to young Hodge than they had ever supposed. They knew very little of his success except from hearsay, but never spoke of him except in praise; and so Miss Byrrell heard on the whole a good report of him.

At Christmas she went home for a visit and he called upon her in her home town. In March he told me that his law practice and other activities were bringing him more than a hundred dollars a month. Then one Sunday in April he came out to Pecan, and as I was returning from a call and passed Parson Mabrey's, the two came running out to me hand-in-hand. I saw by the girl's face what had taken place, and I think I said a little prayer in my heart. The two were married.

"Congratulate us, Doctor!" cried the girl.

But I didn't. I was choking with rage at Roy for marrying her before he was absolutely sure of himself.

"Boy!" I said, looking at him straight in the eye, "if you ever give this girl cause to be sorry she married you, I'll—punch your face for you if it is the last thing I ever do! Giddap!" This last, to the horses, was accented with a sharp blow of the whip.

I locked myself in my room that night and held a lengthy session with myself. I had never dreamed of making this girl my wife,—I was too old and staid for that, I knew,—but I had planned and dreamed vaguely of a great future for her, in which I might have some humble part,—and she had done this thing so suddenly. It gave me an ague to think of that glorious creature reduced to actual want or with her pride broken. She was a song bird that could never live except in the sunshine and open air,—this I knew, and I knew that Roy Hodge was by no means over the divide to safety.

The new Mrs. Hodge resigned from our school the next day and took a private class in Centralia before the month was out. I heard in June from Roy's father that the two of them were making a hundred and sixty dollars a month between them. I visited them that month. They were boarding at a very handsome house on Hirondelle Avenue, and I must say I have never visited two young people who seemed happier in one another's society.

There is just one name for Roy Hodge's attitude toward his wife at that time. He worshiped her. She never ceased to be a creature of beauty and wonder to him. She never became credible to him. He walked about with his good fortune on tiptoe, as it were, as if he thought he were dreaming and might wake himself up. He loaded Theo with costly presents. He bought her bonbons and flowers and jewels; and I began to fear that he might be making debts that he could never pay.

In the fall I asked Judge Hanby how the boy was doing, and he told me of one case from which he had got six hundred dollars as a fee. He said the boy's knowledge of law was uncanny and that if nothing happened to him he would be the foremost lawyer in Centralia before two years.

That winter he and Theo bought a two thousand dollar touring car and took apartments for light housekeeping. They had brought her piano from her home in Mississippi and had bought other furniture. One notable object was a thousand-dollar cabinet graphophone. But the girl's clothing and jewels were what struck me most. She got herself talked about by dressing more elegantly than some of the richest young women in Centralia.

But she loved these things. Beautiful objects belonged with that child as perfume belongs with a rose. Had she been my wife I feel sure I should have bankrupt myself in a year buying her pretties. Still I felt afraid for the two of them, and one day I went to Roy and protested.

He only laughed and said: "Why, Doc., I'm making plenty of money. Last month I made an even nine hundred dollars. I tried to tell him the fable of the ant and the grasshopper, but he would not listen to me, although once or twice his face went dead serious as I talked.

On another occasion I was present when he brought his wife a diamond-encrusted bracelet. I have no idea how much it cost, but I am sure it was worth a great deal.

"Roy," she chided, while her eyes crept from his face in spite of her to devour the bracelet, "you ought not buy these costly things for me. It's you behind the gift that I care for. If you bring me some simple thing like a box of candy or two or three roses I'd care just as much for it."

"Listen, dearie," he said, laughing. "The other day I was standing inside Leob's Jewelry Store when you passed by, and I saw you looking at this and saw the expression on your face through the glass. Here, put it on. Ah, your wrist adds beauty to the bracelet." Roy was a genuine lover. I have never seen one like him.

It was the succeeding November, on a dreary midnight following the dreariest of days, that I heard a feminine step on my front veranda and a timid tap at my door. I thought it must be that Mrs. Lane was dying and that one of her big girls had come for me. I had left the woman at ten o'clock and told her husband that if she took a turn for the worse he could send for me. But I was not prepared for the shock I received when I opened the door. A mud-draggled, tragic creature stood before me in the rain, and so wild was her expression and so haggard her features that I did not at first recognize Theodosia Hodge.

She spoke first: "Get your car, Doctor; I have come to you for help!"

I hurried out and cranked my newly purchased Ford and ran it round to the front gate. My mind pictured an auto accident with Roy Hodge lying unconscious or dead beside the road, for I knew how both he and Theo loved speed. By the girl's appearance she had walked for some distance.

"Shall I need my surgical instruments?" I asked, as I picked up my medicine bags.

"No, nor that either," panted the girl.

"What then," I began.

"It's Roy," she answered hardly above a whisper. "He's done something—taken money that didn't—didn't belong to him, and he's done—disappeared completely."

I choked back an oath.

"Where do we go?" I asked.

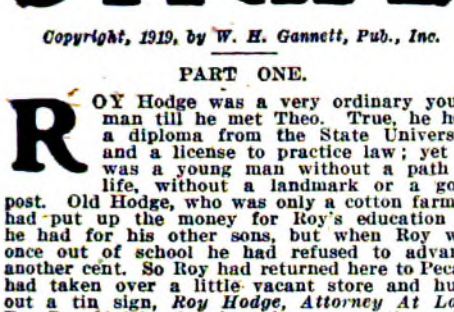
Buffalo's Hump Brings Beef Type

By Carol C. Crain

C. A. GOODNIGHT, the grand old man of Texas and the owner of the largest group of buffalo in the United States, says that the longhorn must go. According to his viewpoint, ranchmen of the West and South are losing money as long as they stick to the time-honored type of the plains.



A few years ago Goodnight started a series of experiments in cattle breeding. Stock with plenty of blue blood seemed to be too soft for the range and a hardier stock was needed. He started out to develop the stock by crossing buffalo with Herefords and the sacred cattle of India with Black Poled Angus.

What Goodnight wanted was a better beef type. He believed that the cross of buffalo with Herefords would produce a blocky, solid animal with plenty of bone. He wanted to gain the advantage of the buffalo's big forward hump and to overcome the handicap of his narrower hind-quarters. "Catlo" is the name of the new breed.

The crossing of the sacred animals of India with the Black Polled Angus was a disappointment, for they are wild as antelopes and cannot be tamed. Although Goodnight has had them on his ranch for some years, they will not fit in with their environment.

The longhorn is destined to vanish from his haunts if the "Catlo" catches the fancy of the Texas landowner and the ranchmen of the West. There are many points in favor of the new breed, but the fact that the "Catlo" is a fourth larger than the Hereford commands attention. If the breed could be substituted throughout the world for the present prevailing types, the total annual beef production would show an increase of twenty-five per cent.

With such men as Goodnight and Burbank of California applying their genius to the problem of creating greater food supplies, famine and starvation will pass from the earth. It is for such men and their epochal attainments that the memorials of the future must be built.

"Have you money?" she asked.

"I have forty francs, signorina. I have saved for eighteen months every sou I could get."

Eighteen months saving eight dollars!

Violet regarded the girl with sorrowful astonishment.

"That is very little; let me give you you some more," she cried, and eagerly opening her well-filled purse, counted out some gold-pieces amounting to fifty francs more.

"No, signorina, not a sou," Lisette returned, firmly, as she waved back Violet's extended hand. "My heart is heavy now with all you have done for me—giving me these beautiful clothes in exchange for a poor peasant's dress. I cannot take your money."

"Please," persisted Violet. "I have plenty, and can easily spare you this."

But the girl made a proud gesture of dissent.

"The signorina must go; and I must get on, also," she said, gravely. "Keep to the straight road until you come to the track in the village. You can get no ticket, but the guard will charge you a couple of francs for your fare. Adieu, signorina."

She was about turning away, when Violet stopped her.

"Lisette," she said, holding out her hand, "good by. You have been very kind to me, and I shall always remember you kindly. I hope we shall meet again some time."

Tears were in Lisette's eyes as she responded in a similar strain, and then led Violet from the shed.

"That way, go; adieu!" she said, pointing eastward; then raising the hand she held, she pressed her lips impulsively to it and dropped it.

With a softly breathed farewell in response, Violet turned and walked quickly away, while Lisette went back into the shed, put out her candle, and threw the end away, after which she turned in the opposite direction and began to climb the steep hills or cliffs, along which the highway led to Mentone.

Violet went on her way in the darkness, her heart beating rapidly with fear lest she should encounter some rude fisherman or peasant who would stop and question her.

She was footsore and weary long before she came in sight of the village, for a mile was a long distance to her unaccustomed muscles, while Lisette's heavy shoes hurt her tender feet sorely.

But, guided by the lights along the railroad track, she found her way to the crossing the girl had told her about, and, sinking down upon a pile of sleepers by the road-bed, she uttered a sigh of relief that she had reached the end of her long walk.

She did not have a great while to wait, for presently the cars came thundering along, and soon she was on the train for Nice, whence she took an express for Paris. Now she felt safe from pursuit, as she was being whirled northward at the rate of forty miles an hour.

CHAPTER XX.

VIOLET RETURNS TO AMERICA.

Meanwhile the kind-hearted peasant girl, Lisette, feeling as if she had been suddenly changed into another being by some good fairy—and she certainly looked like a different person, clad as she was like a lady—was walking at a swinging pace toward Mentone, and—her doom.

She intended to walk until the day began to dawn, and then beg a ride to Monaco in one of the market-carts which made daily trips from the country to that city.

It was still very dark, and the road, which lay up a steep hill, was very narrow, and ran dangerously near the cliffs which overhung the sea.

The girl had worked very hard the previous day, while she had slept none that night, for she had been too much excited, over the thought of leaving her home, to rest, and she now began to experience a feeling of weariness and languor stealing over her. It was the reaction coming on, while added to that was a feeling of dread and loneliness over the uncertainty of the future.

More than this, she found the boots, which Violet had insisted must go with the rest of her costume, were too tight to be comfortable, and this greatly impeded her progress.

She climbed to the top of the cliffs and there sat down by the roadside upon a huge bowlder, where she had rested many a time before, to recover herself a little before going on.

The stone was an irregular one, with a projection which formed a support for her back, and leaning against this, she was overcome by weariness before she knew it and fell into a sound sleep.

It did not seem as if ten minutes had elapsed since she sat down, though in reality it was more than half an hour, when the sound of a galloping horse aroused her.

She started to her feet, a cry of terror and dismay breaking from her. It was still so dark that she could see nothing any distance away, but the sound of that swiftly advancing horse made her heart beat with fearful throbs.

Was it some pursuer coming in search of her? Had her flight been discovered at home, and was her tyrannical stepfather coming to force her back into wearisome servitude? Or, worse yet, to sell her to another man equally brutal and unkind?

She started to flee, but, not being able to clearly distinguish the road, while she was sadly bewildered by having been so suddenly aroused from her sleep, she turned in the wrong direction and made straight for the edge of the cliff.

It was very strange—as familiar as she was with every inch of the ground between her home and Mentone—that she should have become so confused and lost as to her location, and it was only when she caught the ominous sound of the washing of the waves against the rocks below that she became conscious of her danger.

But she was rushing at such headlong speed she could not save herself; a low shuddering cry of terror burst from her lips as she suddenly lost her balance; there was a short interval of silence, followed by a heavy splash in the waters below, then the waves closed over the unfortunate girl, and the ocean held the secret of her fate, as well as of Violet's mysterious disappearance.

The cliff was very high at that point, and projected considerably over the sea, which was very deep just there.

The girl sank at once to the bottom, and, her clothing probably becoming entangled among the rocks, her body was held there for some weeks, and only disturbed and washed far below to the point where the fishermen had found it after a storm of considerable violence.

It was, of course, unrecognizable, but every article which she wore tended to prove that she was Vane Cameron's lost bride-elect. As such he claimed her, without a doubt as to her identity, and, as we already know, laid her to rest beneath the shadow of the venerable beech in one corner of the churchyard at Mentone.

Lisette's parents never once suspected what her fate had been.

Upon discovering that she had fled, her iron-hearted master had started in search of her, vowing that she should pay dearly for daring to run away from him, and the future that he had planned for her.

He learned that a peasant girl, answering to her description, had boarded the westward-bound train at the village, in the early morning, and had left it again at Nice.

He hastened hither at once, and was told that such a girl had been seen in the waiting-room of the station; but further than that he could get no trace of her, and was finally obliged to return to his home, where, upon the other members of his family, he vented his disappointment and anger over the loss of such valuable help.

The mother, who was far superior to her husband in every way, grieved long and bitterly over the loss of her first-born, but it was many months before she learned the truth regarding her untimely end.

Violet's journey to Paris was accomplished with very little weariness and nothing of incident. Her first business upon reaching the French metropolis was to go to a lady's furnishing house, where she purchased a simple but comfortable outfit, after which she proceeded to a respectable pension, which she had heard highly recommended by some Americans whom she had met in London.

It was fortunate that she had a liberal supply of money in her possession. She had never been stinted, for it was supposed that she was the heir to a large fortune, and a certain income was paid to her quarterly. Since she had been joined by her sister and her husband she had not had occasion to use much money, as Mr. Mencke had settled all her bills, and she had several hundred dollars in her possession at the time of her flight.

This fact, together with the discovery that she could find a very safe and pleasant home for a time in the pension, where she was stopping, somewhat changed her original plan of returning directly to America, and she resolved to remain in Paris a while for the purpose of perfecting herself more fully in French, and also to take a few finishing lessons in music, for she had determined to make use of these branches in supporting herself in the future.

She threw her whole heart into her work, and few people would have recognized in this grave, studious girl, the bright, laughing, care-free Violet who had been such a favorite among her friends in Cincinnati the year previous.

She put herself under the best of teachers, and made the most of her time and opportunities; thus nearly four months slipped by, and then she resolved to go home to America.

It was the last of September when she left Paris for London, where she remained several days to make preparations for the voyage, before proceeding to Glasgow to take the steamer, she having decided to sail from there, because she could obtain a comfortable passage at cheaper rates on the Anchor Line, and it was now becoming necessary for her to husband her funds a little.

It was the fifth of October when she left London for Glasgow, and it was her face that Wallace had seen looking from the carriage window as he was detained for a few minutes by a blockade in the street.

Violet, however, was wholly unconscious of her proximity to her lover—or her husband, as we now know him to be. She was deeply absorbed in her own thoughts, and was gazing at nothing in particular; therefore, the carriage that she was in had passed Lord Cameron's without her having a suspicion that she had attracted the attention of anyone.

She was driven on to the Midland Grand station, where she took a train for Glasgow, and that evening boarded the Circassia for New York, where she arrived eleven days later—three days after the return of Wallace, who had sailed on a faster vessel.

One can imagine something of the loneliness and desolation which this young and delicately reared girl experienced upon finding herself adrift and an utter stranger in that great city and with but little money in her purse.

She longed to learn the circumstances of Wallace's supposed death, her grief over which had been newly aroused on returning to her native land.

She had known before leaving for Europe that he had received an offer of partnership with some New York architect; but he had not mentioned the name of the gentleman before she left, and, not having received any of his letters, she did not know whether he had closed with the offer, and, therefore, did not know where to go to make any inquiries relative to his movements after her departure.

She dare not go to Cincinnati to ascertain—she dare not write to ask anything about him, for she was determined that her sister should not know where she was. She had become entirely alienated by her unkindness, and felt that she would much prefer to toil for her daily bread than to go back to her and be subject to her arbitrary control again.

"There are hundreds of girls as young as I, even younger, who have to support themselves, and I believe I am just as capable of earning my own living," she mused, considering her future. "At any rate, I am determined to make the trial, and if I find I cannot earn a living there will be time enough then to appeal to the court to appoint a different guardian for me, and demand my money from Wilhelm."

The poor child had yet to learn that there was no money to demand.

She found a quiet, respectable boarding place a few days after her arrival in New York, and then took time by the forelock, by inserting the following advertisement in two of the daily papers:

A LADY, JUST RETURNED FROM EUROPE, and fitted to teach music and French, would like a few pupils. Address H., at this office.

Two days thereafter Violet received a single letter in answer to her advertisement, and it read thus:

"If H. will call at No. — Fifth Avenue, she may learn something to her advantage."

Violet was greatly disappointed to receive only one response; but she argued that one pupil might open the way for others; so she dressed herself with great care; took her music-roll under her arm, and made her way to the address mentioned.

"No. — Fifth Avenue" proved to be a palatial residence, with the name Lawrence gleaming in silver letters upon the door, and Violet's heart sank a little as she mounted the marble steps, for she feared that she might not be competent to teach in an aristocratic family such as doubtless inhabited this elegant mansion.

Her ring was answered by a colored servant, in livery, to whom she stated her errand, giving him her card, whereupon she was ushered into a reception-room upon the right of a magnificent hall.

Everything about her bespoke unlimited wealth, while the most perfect taste was displayed in the harmonizing tints of everything, the costly pictures, statuettes, bric-a-brac, and curios.

Ten minutes elapsed. It seemed an age to anxious Violet; then the rich draperies of the archway leading into the hall were swept aside, and a tall, finely proportioned man of perhaps fifty years entered her presence.

He was distinguished-looking, with clear-cut features, an intelligent, expressive eye, and a grandly-shaped head; but there was a worn look on his brow, a sad and anxious expression on his face that bespoke care and sorrow.

"Miss Huntington, I presume," he remarked, bowing gravely yet courteously to her, as he glanced at the card which she had sent him by the servant.

"Yes, sir," Violet replied, and taking the letter, which she had received that morning, from her hand-bag, she passed it to him, while she added: "I have come to inquire if I am to find a pupil here. I judged that such must be the fact, since the letter was in response to my advertisement."

Mr. Lawrence did not reply immediately; he seemed to be studying the beautiful girl before him—the sad though lovely face, which was crowned with such a mass of gleaming gold; the graceful figure, in its simple but tasteful costume, while the small hand, so neatly encased in its perfectly fitting glove, and the little foot, in its natty walking-boot, did not escape his observation.

It was easy to perceive that he was favorably impressed by his fair visitor, for when he did speak he was even more kind and courteous than before.

"I was impressed, Miss Huntington, when I read your advertisement, that you were a young lady in search of employment," he said; "and as I am also looking for some young lady to fill a vacancy, it occurred to me that, although you had advertised for 'pupils,' you might be persuaded—if we should be mutually pleased with each other—to devote yourself to one, provided the remuneration were sufficient."

"Ah, you are looking for a governess," Violet remarked, with a quiet smile, and in no wise displeased by the proposition.

"Not a governess, according to the common acceptation of the term," the gentleman returned, in a sad tone. "But let me tell you exactly how I am situated, and what I desire; then you can decide as to the desirability of the position. I have a daughter," Mr. Lawrence resumed, after a moment of thought, "who is in her twelfth year. She is blind——"

"Blind!" repeated Violet, in such a tender, sympathetic tone, and with such a compassionate glance that her companion's face lighted with a grateful smile.

"Yes," he answered, "she was born totally blind. It is a peculiar case, and I have been told there is only one other on record like it. It is called cataract of the lens; but when my child was nine months old, a noted oculist, whom we consulted, thought that an operation might be performed which would at least give her a portion of her sight. Of course, I was willing to consent to anything that would mitigate, even to the smallest extent, her heavy affliction. The cataracts were punctured through the pupils, and she saw, very faintly at first, but, as time elapsed and the cataracts began to be absorbed, her sight strengthened somewhat. Her sight is very limited, however; she can see to get about the house, and distinguishes objects of any size with the aid of glasses, but not well enough to read, and whatever she learns is taught by reading aloud to her. She has a remarkable memory, as most blind people have, I believe, and she is extremely fond of music, both vocal and instrumental. Do you sing, Miss Huntington?" Mr. Lawrence asked, suddenly breaking in upon his account of his little daughter's condition.

"Yes, sir, I have spent more time upon vocal culture than upon instrumental music," Violet responded, and this assurance drew forth a smile of approbation from her host.

"I have had many governesses for her," the gentleman resumed, "and she has spent two years in an institution for the blind, though for the last six months I have been obliged myself to teach her all that she has learned. And now I come to the most trying portion of my story," he added, a slight flush tinging his face. "I feel it is only right that I should be perfectly frank with you in the matter, and so feel obliged to tell you that Bertha possesses a very strong, an almost indomitable will, and there are times when she becomes sullen and unmanageable. She will not study, she will not practice, or do anything which she imagines is required of her; and thus, for a time, the whole household is in a most uncomfortable state; for, while she refuses obedience to others, she is equally insistent upon requiring instant compliance with all her demands. When the fit passes, she is again gentle, merry and lovable. Now, my object in sending for you, Miss Huntington, was, providing I was favorably impressed with you, to ask if you would consent to devote all your time to one pupil instead of several. The position will require a steady, persistent, even temperament—one of mingled gentleness and firmness—and I believe I see lines of decision in your face; you have a strong will, have you not?"

"I have been told that I have," Violet replied, smiling, "but"—growing very grave again "whether I possess firmness sufficient to cope with the will you have described, I cannot say. I have never had any experience in the government of children; but I should say that tact would prove more effective in the management of your daughter than an obstinate insistence regarding obedience."

Mr. Lawrence's face lighted at this remark.

"That is the wisest observation that I have ever heard any governess make regarding the control of Bertha," he said. "Miss Huntington, will you make a trial of it for a while?"

Still Violet looked grave. She felt that the responsibility would be a great one, and she trembled for the result.

Yet her sympathies were enlisted both for this careworn, perplexed father, and for his afflicted child, while, too, the idea of a permanent, pleasant home was an attractive feature to her.

"Money would be no object," Mr. Lawrence continued, as she did not reply, "if the right person could be obtained, and if you could but achieve a strong influence over the child and sway her by tact, or by any other method, I would gladly give you any price you choose to name. Somehow I feel impelled to urge you to come to us—the very fact that you hesitate to accept the position assures me that you are wise in the consideration of all projects."

Better Than Turkey

by W. W. Hatfield

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

TURKEY and Thanksgiving, like liver and onions, Mutt and Jeff, and Capital and Labor, have become inseparable in our minds. The annual feast of the gobbler is an institution as old, almost, as the Plymouth Rock itself. Most restaurant turkeys are older. For upwards of three centuries, now, the habit has grown upon us, until, at length, we have learned to take an inventory of our castor oil and dyspepsia tablets on the Wednesday before the last Thursday in November. Thus far have we wandered from the truth, which is, dear friends, that thanksgiving is an expression of the heart and not a depression of the stomach. Only dogs and little children—as you shall see—understand this.

There was sorrow in the heart of Jake Smith, gloom, black gloom, upon his brow, and in his hands an evening paper, whose bold headlines carried the annual information that the President had set aside the morrow for a Day of Thanksgiving, in commemoration of a custom inaugurated by somebody or other who had landed on a rock or something in 1620. Jake had landed on many rocks. There were words of bitterness on his tongue and seventeen cents in his pocket. Seventeen cents to buy turkey and cranberry sauce!

"Huh!" grunted Jake, with surreptitious glances at Mrs. Jake and the boy. "Fat chance!"

Mrs. Smith was washing the supper dishes in grim silence and a tin dishpan. She was built on the angular plan, and suggested gauntness and starvation. Much work had roughened her hands, while its twin sister, worry, had wrinkled her face. Just now one of her cheeks was wet. She was looking at Buster.

Buster, being five, and blissfully ignorant of the great hiatus between seventeen cents and a turkey, was the only happy member of the family, except Fuzzy.

Fuzzy had been in the family three days. He had adopted Buster. Indescribably dirty, towsled, frowsy as to his long, mud-matted hair, ludicrously ugly as to his little, wrinkled, black face, there was, nevertheless, something about Fuzzy's great, pleading eyes, his superlative gravity of demeanor, his joyous bark and the wag of his bushy tail, that went straight to your heart.

"'Peak for it, Fuzzy, 'peak for it," gurgled Buster, holding up an imaginary wing of tomorrow's turkey.

Fuzzy balanced himself on his hind legs and barked.

Gloom settled more heavily on Jake.

"That's the worst of it," he told himself, "disappointin' the kid. 'Tain't so bad for ma and me—we can understand—but it's gonna be dang hard to make Buster see why he's got to eat bread and molasses tomorrow, when——"

He gritted his teeth and went to the window. Twilight and a light snow were falling. Lights gleamed murkily from the huddled hundreds of cabins and shacks in the valley. A mile away, to the left, the stack of a great smelter reared itself four hundred feet into the air, belching its foul smoke in a far-flung stream that threatened to engulf the purity of the distant, snow-capped mountains. Beneath the stack sprawled the smelter itself, a monstrous machine, of which Jake was a cog—a vast, indiscriminate crusher of ores and men's lives, a soulless producer of wealth, wealth that, in utter defiance of the law of gravity, poured up the hillside on the right, where, as the eye traveled upward, it saw the houses grow finer and the lights grow brighter, until, arriving at the very summit, it rested on the mansion of Adolphus Bartlett, owner of the smelter.

"Dang him!" muttered Jake. They ain't no sufferin' in his house."

Jake was wrong. At that very moment, there was suffering in the great house on the hill. There was grief, deep grief, in the heart of Mrs. Adolphus Bartlett, and gloom, black gloom, upon her brow. Sobs shook her plump body. Plump is the aristocratic substitute for the plebian word fat. Tears and rouge stained her cheeks. Her Algernon was gone. Childless, she grieved sorely. For three days the search had been in vain. None came to claim the reward she had offered.

Wearily, Jake had resumed his chair and his evening paper. Listlessly, he turned the pages, until, at length, there came to his eye this boldly captioned item: and no questions asked, for the return of the Pomeranian puppy, lost, strayed or stolen from the Bartlett grounds, November 24. Wears silver collar engraved with his name, Algernon. MRS. ADOLPHUS BARTLETT.

ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS' REWARD,

Jake threw down the paper in disgust, to the exuberant delight of Fuzzy, who immediately seized upon it as raw material for the manufacture of ribbons and confetti. Smith placed a gentle hand on the dog's neck to restrain his devastating proclivities, and encountered a hard, circular object that had hitherto remained hidden in Fuzzy's mud-matted mane. Thus did the secret come out. Fuzzy, the tramp, was not Fuzzy, the tramp. He was an aristocrat in disguise, a scion of nobility incognito. The hard, circular object was a silver collar, and it was engraved with the name, Algernon.

Gathering the dog in one arm and the paper in the other, Jake executed three steps of a Choctaw war dance.

"Lookit, ma, lookit!" he whooped.

Ma looked.

"A hunner' dollars!" she breathed, faintly.

A wet saucer slipped from her fingers and shivered into a thousand pieces on the floor. She sank limply into a chair.

"A hunner' dollars!" she whispered. "My Gawd, it can't be!"

But Jake was gone. Through the window she could see him plunging up the hill, the dog in his arms. Fuzzy was struggling furiously to be free, pouring out his dog heart in yelping rebellion against being thus heartlessly torn away from the master he had adopted. Mingled with his wails were the sobs of Buster, who rolled upon the floor in ecstasy of grief and a puddle of dishwater.

On up the hill Jake trudged, through the gathering storm and darkness, mindful of nothing but the hundred dollars which was to bring peace and plenty and Thanksgiving to the Smith cabin. The yelps of Fuzzy sounded in his ears as something far, far distant. To his feet, the thirty minutes of strenuous climb up the hill were but as many seconds in the winged slippers of Mercury.

A perspiring plebian, he rang the doorbell of the mansion on the hill. The pompous menial upon whom devolved the duty of opening the door eyed him with doubt and disfavor, and, but for the mud-stained letter of introduction which barked and wriggled in his arms, would have turned him away. As it was, Jake was admitted to a great hall, a vast, high-ceilinged, tomb-like cavern, dimly magnificent with a soft glow from hidden lights. The pompous menial left him there. Then came Mrs. Bartlett, gowned with so gorgeous a scantiness that Jake blushed, studiously fixed his eyes on an imaginary point in the floor, and wondered what kept her from catching cold. Algernon, dirt-encrusted as he was, was gathered into the plump, bare arms and bosom of his ecstatic mistress. A polished secretary drifted in on noiseless pumps, counted into Jake's hand ten ten-dollar bills, inclined one eye meaningly toward the door, and vanished. The pompous menial opened the door, fixed his own commanding optic on Jake, and swept him out into the night as one flecks a crawling beetle from a white tablecloth.

There were turkey and cranberry sauce galore in the home of Jake Smith on the morrow. There was joy in the hearts of Mr. and Mrs. Jake, smiles on their faces, and a feeling of great fullness and satisfaction in their stomachs.

But in the heart of Buster was a sadness no turkey could dispel, a vacancy no cranberry sauce could fill. Joy, appetite and Fuzzy had gone out of his life together.

There was happiness in the heart of Mrs. Adolphus Bartlett, also. Smiles wreathed her face. Algernon, once more white and beautiful, was cuddled to her bosom.

"'Oo's 'ittle ootsum-toodlums is 'oo?" she cooed.

Algernon growled. There was sorrow, deep sorrow, in his heart, and gloom, dark gloom, sat upon his little, black countenance. No longer did he find delight in these sweet, inane nothings murmured to him by his ecstatic mistress. The perfume in his nostrils strangled him. The pulverized meat which he was fed from a dainty plate at the table nauseated him. The pink ribbon tied in a bow on his bushy tail irritated him. He wanted to roll in the dirt, to sit at the feet of Buster and bark for the bones of the turkey, to drag the bones out and bury them in secluded corners, to chase cats down alleys and bark at automobiles. He moped and sulked, hung his head, and refused to eat.

"'Oos 'ittle ootsy-tootsy-widdlums-squiddlums is 'oo?" gurgled Mrs. Bartlett, kissing him on the nose.

Algernon growled again and snapped viciously at his mistress. Alarmed, she dropped him to the floor. Then, cautiously, she removed his silver collar, put him to bed and sent for a doctor.

The doctor came. Not being a dog doctor, he scratched his head in perplexity when he saw his patient; but he was equal to the occasion. He took Algernon's temperature, gave him a harmless pill—which was refused—talked learnedly for five minutes on the subject of rabies—the only dog disease he knew of besides mange—rendered a bill for ten dollars, and went his way.

Algernon still sulked. His mistress, after a while, began to wonder if there could be anything in this talk about rabies. She examined Algernon's jaws for signs of froth, and found none. Still, there was a slight, morose redness about his eyes that might savor of approaching madness. So she consigned him to the care of a maid and hied herself to safer quarters.

Now, the maid, having an inherited distaste for dogs, especially mad dogs, was not overstrict in her attentions; so it chanced that Algernon, after a while, wriggled unobserved from his bed to wander about the house. He was hungry, though not for worlds would he have accepted food from the hand of Mrs. Bartlett. In the bathroom he found a cake of soap. Being young and ignorant, as well as hungry, he helped himself to a large mouthful. The result was electrifying. Nauseated, with soap suds slavering from his jaws, yelping with indignation and disgust, he tore down the hall, down the stairs, dashed in and out of doors, searching frantically for somebody, anybody, from whom he might expect solace and alleviation of misery.

In the library he encountered his mistress. Straight for her he headed, loosing, as he ran, howl upon agonized howl.

Mrs. Adolphus Bartlett took one look at his foaming jaws and mounted a table. Gathering her skirts about her, she lifted her voice in a long-drawn, terror-stricken, rat-like scream that drowned the howls of Algernon as a steam calliope drowns the sound of a jew's-harp. Servants came running in from all quarters.

"Help! Mad dog!" she screamed.

Like snowflakes touched by boiling water, the servants melted away as the words fell upon them.

All the while, Algernon was leaping for the table, falling short, and leaping again, his dismal yelps increasing in volume at each failure.

Again the shrill, soul-congealing screams of Mrs. Adolphus Bartlett filled the house.

"Help! Mad dog!"

Armed with a revolver and a riding-crop, there entered the room the imposing menial who had opened the door to Jake Smith on the previous evening. Cautiously, he circled about the yelping, leaping Algernon.

At sight of the revolver, whose muzzle pointed in divers directions and shifted its viewpoint erratically, Mrs. Bartlett's terror broke out afresh.

"Don't shoot!" she squeaked. "Don't shoot!"

Thus adjured, the menial aimed a careful blow with the riding-crop. The lash caught Algernon on the tip of the tail, a tender spot with well-bred dogs. Pouring out the remnant of his soul in one protracted howl, he dashed for the door. Fortunately, it was open. All the doors in the house were open. Those who had gone through them had sacrificed all things needless to haste. It was no time for closing doors.

When Algernon emerged from the kitchen door, a streak of white mingling with the falling snowflakes and the shades of evening, flapping skirts and coat tails were disappearing towards all points of the compass. But for the pink ribbon, which had come untied, and now floated behind him in two long streamers, his own speed would have rendered him indistinguishable. In lumbering, undignified, yet rapid pursuit came the pompous menial, firing wildly at the twin streamers. At each successive shot, the screams of the freshly-affrighted, fleeing men- and maid-servants broke out anew. No one had any confidence in the butler's shooting abilities.

One hundred yards behind the house bubbled a giant spring, feeding a creek which coursed down the hillside. At the brink of this creek Algernon paused, still yelping. It was too wide to leap. Besides, he had been reared in the sheltered life, and the water was cold. Growling, he turned upon his pursuer. He was only a little dog, but, brought to bay, his alter ego, that part of him which his fat, perfumed mistress had sought vainly to squelch with coddling and cuddling and fond, inane pet names, asserted itself. Indignation swelled him into bigness and bravery. Had he not, day before yesterday, made one of those big, lumbering automobiles run for its life while he barked at its rubber heels?

The butler, thoroughly frightened, stopped, ten feet away, and dropped his riding-crop. There were still two shots left in his revolver. Grasping the weapon in both hands, and swallowing a bewildering succession of Adam's apples, he took careful aim. The gun roared. Algernon rose to his hind legs and staggered, yelping with pain. Again the butler fired. Algernon swayed, wildly, for a moment, then tumbled backward into the creek. The swirling, icy waters closed over his head.

Cautiously, the menial approached the bank. He saw a little pool of blood where Algernon had made his last stand, and a fleck of foam where the suds had dripped from his jaws. But of Algernon, though his assassin waited, with reloaded revolver for five minutes, nothing further was to be seen. Not caring to delve into the chilly creek for the remains of a mad dog in whom life might not yet be totally extinct, he returned to the house and reported to Mrs. Bartlett that he had slain the beast with his trusty revolver. Whereupon, Mrs. Bartlett rewarded him, literally, with gold, and, figuratively, with a hero's crown; after which she dried her eyes and bade the secretary bring her the dog catalog, that she might pick out another child to console her in her bereavement.

Thirty yards down the creek, Algernon came to the surface and scrambled out upon the bank. The pink ribbon was gone. So were three inches water. Baste every twenty minutes until turkey is cooked, which will require about three hours for an eight-pound turkey. While cooking, the turkey should be turned frequently.

GRAVY.—Pour liquid from pan, and return to pan about five tablespoons of the turkey fat, and into this work five tablespoons of dry flour and stir as it bubbles and browns. To this add the cooked giblets chopped fine and the water they were cooked in, which should measure about three cups; also return to pan the turkey drippings. Stir and cook ten minutes. Season with salt and pepper.

STUFFING.—Use soft bread-crumbs or cracker-crumbs highly seasoned with sifted sage, thyme, salt and pepper; or use prepared poultry dressing. Moisten with half a cup of melted butter and enough of boiling water slowly added to make quite moist. Add one beaten egg.

ROAST DUCK.—Pick and singe thoroughly to remove down. Draw, wash and wipe dry. Prepare the same as turkey and roast in hot oven about thirty minutes, then reduce heat and cook half an hour longer. Baste and turn frequently.

STUFFING.—Soft bread-crumbs, finely chopped celery and tart apple in equal quantities gives the finest flavor to duck. Add a little hot water and one beaten egg. Flavor with melted butter, pepper and salt.

ROAST SPARERIBS.—Rub well with salt, finely ground sage, a little pepper and flour. Keep a very little water in the pan—just enough for basting, which should be done frequently. Have a slow baking oven, and cook twenty minutes for each pound of pork.

BOILED HAM.—Scrub well and soak three hours in cold water if very salt. Trim off any hard black parts, cover with cold water and simmer slowly, allowing half an hour to the pound. Remove kettle from the stove, but let the ham remain in the water until nearly cold, then remove the thick skin and sprinkle with brown sugar and grated bread-crumbs, and put into hot oven to brown. While hot stick whole cloves into the fat.

THANKSGIVING CAKE.—Beat together one half cup of molasses, one half cup of sugar, and three tablespoons of butter. Add one half teaspoon of salt, two teaspoons of cinnamon, and one fourth teaspoon each of cloves and nutmeg and beat again. Add one well-beaten egg. Dissolve one half teaspoon of soda in one tablespoon of water and stir it into one half cup of thick sour milk, and beat this into the other ingredients. Add one and one half cup of sifted flour and beat hard; then one cup of seeded and chopped raisins which are lightly stirred in. If it is desired to make a more decorative cake, cut good-sized thin slices of citron and nearly line a round buttered cake tin with them, pour in the batter and on top put slices of the citron as shown in picture. Bake in a moderate oven one hour. In frosting do not fully cover the citron.

MOCK MINCE PIES.—Roll six crackers fine and pour over them one cup of cold water; stir and let it stand fifteen minutes, and then add one cup of molasses and one half cup of brown sugar and stir well together. Soak one cup of seeded raisins and one half cup of currants in one half cup of cider and add to other ingredients with five chopped tart apples, one half teaspoon of cinnamon, a pinch each of cloves and nutmeg, one half cup of melted butter and two eggs. Bake with under and upper crust, or with under and strips of crust across the top. Bake about an hour in moderate oven.

THANKSGIVING PLUM PUDDING.—Three cups of soft, grated bread, two cups of chopped suet, one cup of cleaned currants, two cups of seeded raisins and two thirds of a cup of citron shaved thin, one cup of sugar mixed with three even tablespoons of flour, half a teaspoon of salt and half a teaspoon of grated nutmeg and a little cinnamon. Mix together and add six well-beaten eggs and half a cup of milk. Put into buttered mould, cover and steam four hours, then remove from mould and bake half an hour in moderately hot oven. Serve warm with hard sauce.

Things We Didn't Know About The Great War

By Felix J. Koch

WHAT SOLDIER SAM SAW OF THE FARM-LIFE OF FRANCE.

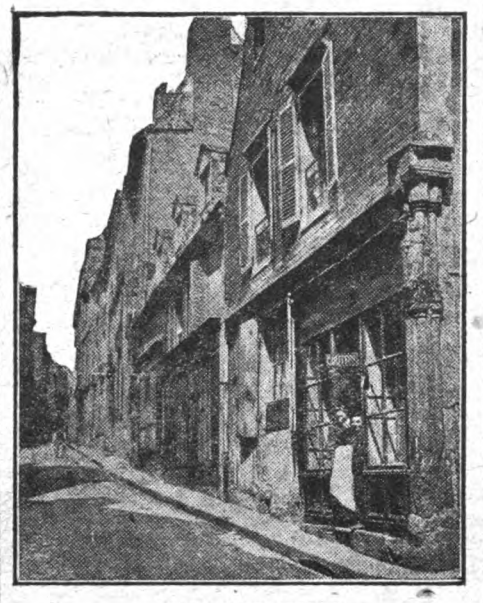
Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

MADAME.

MANY and, indeed, varied the experiences the veterans of World-War have for relating; not alone now, when the war is not such long time over, but, chances are, all the rest of their years; none, however, more entertaining—particularly to the husbandman and those interested in farm life otherwise—than the stories of what Sam saw of farm-life in France!

Soldier Sam, overseas—that's to say, in many cases—was billeted squarely in the homes of the habitants; and where, as so very frequently, these habitants were real French farmers, they saw to it that Sam had no few peeps at their farm lands besides.

The better to get the real savor of those days of billeting in the French Republic, one needs resort to letters Sam wrote of it at the time.



Thus, for one, an interesting bit of correspondence from a young corporal with a supply company at St. Gervais, Sarthe, France.

"Fall," he wrote, "has been arriving and has been making its coming known by the smells arising from the hemp.

"All the stagnant little pools we had noted all about on the farms,—reminding one of the quiet ponds within the rock-wall closures of the farms of our own Kentucky,—are now filled with the sheaves of hemp. This is put here to soak and decay, and then, smelling as unto heaven, it is laid out in the fields to dry!

"Being away out in the country, so to say, with the nearest city, Le Mans, quite so far away that one can visit only when on a pass of some period, the only new event of real interest, aside from actual soldiering, is our contriving with the farmers hereabouts for the acquisition of a pig,—a really, beautiful, French pig!

"With Thanksgiving beginning to loom on the horizon, the company,—that's to say, has induced a farmer to part with a pig, for a consideration; said porker to be fattened for that festive day. French pigs, somehow, are cleaner,—or at least look cleaner, than ours do; and, again, have abnormally long ears. The little stranger is now housed in our corral and is already being very generally regarded as a friend with whom one shares all he can.

THE VILLAGE STREET.

"By the same post I am sending some of the charming embroidery that peasant women do, off-hours, in their homes,—a sort of doily (or it could be used for pillow cover), which is typical and yet so very different from the quiltings and other forms of home needlework we find in our own farms at home!"

It is just a vignette,—a peep into Sam's own especial form of country-life, far overseas there, but it interests, none the less.

Even more so is the picture of French farm-life,—farmer life from within,—which Sam sends from the same town in a shortly-subsequent note.

".....It has turned colder with October," he writes, "and it is almost like winter here.

"Last night, with the cold wind blowing in, we were in fact, decidedly glad that the Demenceau family,—our billetors,—had moved out the house-proper (removing to their beloved Compiegne, from which the Allies have expelled the Boche) and that we might move into the real farm dwelling-rooms in a day or two ourselves!

THE EMBROIDERY.

"Today I rode out to the Bousard farm and got the key to the residence, and this afternoon several of our 'fusiliers,' as they're called, were busy cleaning it out; so that I hope by tomorrow, at least, we will be able to ensconce ourselves in a real high-grade French farm-home. I don't know for how long this luxury will be mine, however, for from the present look of things, I may move up here, at town-heart, to Battalion Headquarters, where I shall be a little nearer my work.

"It seems a little odd without the Demenceaus in the billet! The children were usually playing around,—typical little French country lads,—and Madame was ubiquitous. By this time, I presume, they are safely back in their 'dear Compiegne,' and Madame is walking her thirteen kilometers a day, delivering the letters to French soldiers located in the country, and who, according to her statement, oft'-repeated, are "pas bonne" (not nice) to a lady under the circumstances.

"Meanwhile, the meek Gustave is doubtless riding his bicycle and also executing rural delivery in such wise.

"We shall also miss Madame Julliet,—or 'Bangs,' as the men called her, for the way she wore her hair,—who was a regular visitor to the billet. The good French country-folk, you know, have not been slow in making 'first calls' on their American guests. She was one of the few good-looking women of the locality, and did not look at all like the mother of the two impish children that were generally tagging at her skirts.

Madame has a husband, tucked away somewhere in Paris; which doesn't bother her much. He appears about once a month or so,—a rat-like little man, who looks like an Apache.

THE COUNTRY LASS.

"In fact, as a rule, the 'chicness' of the French women, if it is to be judged by the country folk, is not all that it is 'cracked up to be!' Perhaps it exists in the big cities; but back here in the country the peasant lasses do not at all come up to the standard that romantic fiction has set for them. Dainty, certainly, they are not.

"Most of the farmers' daughters are sturdy female Hercules, who work in the fields all day and live in the upstairs of cow-stables, for a very very large part;—and who really look the part! They appear to be much older than they actually are and seem to mature much earlier than do the women at home. A girl of fifteen here seems far older, indeed, than would an American young woman of twenty.

They walk to field with a stiff, swinging, masculine stride, and would, at times, seem almost ludicrous, were they not so uniquely astonishing. Their sense of proprieties, as well as their moral code, is French, in all that the word implies. I would call them largely unmoral (if one wished to go so far) rather than immoral. They will talk to you, in the most matter-of-fact way, and in fullest details, of things that would never be mentioned at home. Yet, on the other hand, they will consider little things that we deem perfectly proper as not so at all.

"Almost all are most careful of appearances, especially when in the town proper.

"I remember one moonlight night of the past summer, when one of these sturdy young ladies, with whom I was promenading, told me that the town was very straight-laced, and that, if once gossip got started, it might ruin her chance of securing a husband for ever! She discussed securing a husband in much the same manner as American girls would 'buzz' over the purchase of a new winter hat.

"They certainly differ a lot from the 'goose-girls' and the peasant maids of France of the novels and the motion pictures.

"They certainly aren't romantic,—at least not in the scenario-writer's way!

"In a story, on the stage, or on the 'movie'-screen, if a French country lass saw you coming, and wished to attract your notice, she would perhaps accidentally drop a rose. One of these Amazons, wanting a word with you, will pick up a rock, or a clod of mud, the size of your head, and playfully whale it at you! It takes not alone a sense of humor but good ability to dodge, often to escape their friendliness unscathed!

FRENCH PIGS.

".....Have been riding about, on my work, on the bicycle I have here.

"It is quite cozy tonight, in the billet; for we have a crackling wood-fire in the old French grate, with its head of Napoleon at center of the arch, and its irons. The orderlies have left, with their various reports, for the night; and Sergeant-Major O——— and I have the place to ourselves.

News of "things doing," out here in the country, and so matters to talk of, are slight and, really, rare.

Today, though, there was another peasant's funeral in the little country town, and through my window I could see the simple little funeral cortege enter the church, with the priest, chanting prayers, at front; the women,—dressed in black, and wearing the small, white Puritan caps,—behind; each woman bearing a taper; and then the casket and immediate mourners behind."

Such, then, some of Soldier Sam's impressions of the day's work and play,—the pleasures and sorrows,—of our good Gallic Allies of the country.

They're not the stories of battles, victories, truces, things of that sort, very true; but Soldier Sam, now he's home and his trials over, if not forgot, is apt to revert to them with every bit as keen zest as he does the most thrilling, dangerous, or soul-stirring phases of his particular part in the war!

To do your work because you must, to do your work as slavery, and then, having got it done as speedily and as easily as possible, to look somewhere else for enjoyment, that makes a very dreary life.—Phillips Brooks.

Complete Crochet Outfit Given

FOR A CLUB OF THREE

THIS offer is for the woman and girl who "loves her crocheting" and insists upon having the best of everything to work with. In this outfit we give you any desired quantity of Dexter Cordonnette "Silko" crochet and tatting cotton, and three of the highest grade crochet needles. There is no better crochet and tatting cotton than Dexter "Silko"—a fact already known to thousands of our women readers. It is made of the best Sea Island cotton with a twist that makes it lie flat, is highly mercerized and actually improves with washing. It is smooth to the fingers and will not kink. With Dexter "Silko," crocheting is more easily done—and the finished pieces are far more beautiful and useful than if made with cheaper grade cotton. Dexter "Silko" for crocheting comes in all the popular colors—white, ecru, pink, rose pink, light blue, delph blue, king blue, sapphire and sea green, and in sizes 3, 10, 30, 50 and 70. The tatting cotton comes in the same colors and of the size always used for this work.

The three steel crochet needles are the finest made, 5 inches long, nickel plated, perfectly formed and balanced, with flattened finger hold, and a nickel cap that slips on over the end, protecting it when not in use. This cap also prevents the sharp point from doing any damage when carried in the pocket, handbag or work basket. We give you three different sizes of needles—8, 10 and 12.

We believe that our crochet workers will appreciate this offer, as it means a considerable saving to be able to secure such an outfit as this without expense. We will send you this complete outfit, also additional quantities of the crochet and tatting cotton free upon the terms of the following special offers.

Offer No. 8563. For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you the three crochet needles, one ball of Dexter "Silko" crochet cotton and three balls of Dexter "Silko" tatting cotton free by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to give color and size wanted. Premium No. 8563.

Offer No. 8251. We will furnish you with extra balls of the crochet cotton at the rate of two balls for one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents, sent by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to give color and size wanted. Premium No. 8251.

Offer No. 8261. We will furnish you with extra balls of the tatting cotton at the rate of four balls for one one-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents, sent by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to mention color wanted. Premium No. 8261.

The Talcott Treasure

By Anne McQueen

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Colonel Talcott, before the beginning of the Civil War, converts his securities into eagles and double eagles. Trusting his overseer, who is also a soldier, and confiding the secret to his wife, the men leave the town for the plantation, where he intends to secrete the treasure. Both men are killed in a skirmish and no trace of the money is discovered. Fifty years later, Eleanor Talcott and Nancy Dare, working in New York for the same firm and discussing the possibilities of the future and longing for a home, are surprised by Eleanor receiving a letter. Her father's great Aunt Talcott, whom she has never seen, leaves a plantation to her great nephew or his heirs and assigns. Nancy, who is practical and engaged to John Carr, realizes the expense of keeping the plantation up. Eleanor, with memories of sunshine, flowers and mocking birds, is anxious to go, provided Nancy will make it her home. Both girls go to Georgia, where they are driven from the station to the plantation ten miles distant, by an antebellum negro, who announces their arrival to the old negro servants, Brer Silas, Daphne, and Bahama, her husband. Going into the old house, whose doors swing on rusty hinges, Nancy wonders if Eleanor will live in this forsaken place. Daphne takes them to a chamber, from whose walls the paper hangs and the ceiling showing bare laths, then hurries to prepare supper. The next morning Bahama shows the girls the premises, which are sadly neglected, and repeats the desire of the half strainers, who own a beautiful plantation adjoining, to buy old Miss' land. Eleanor realizes the need of general repairs but cannot consent to part with the Talcott heirlooms. Writing to Mr. Warner, her lawyer, and father's old-time friend, Eleanor goes down the road to mail the letter and, pausing beside a wire fence, attempts to pull down a branch twined with a vine, upon which grow luscious grapes. She is surprised by a friendly voice and the offer to reach the grapes for her. Retaining a picture of the stranger, she queries whom he can be. Eleanor finally decides upon repairing the roof where it is absolutely necessary, buying an incubator and a mule. After going all over the house and seeing the rare old china and silver and wondering will she ever use them, she packs them carefully away, seeing only the face of the young man who gives the grapes. Mr. Warner, Eleanor's attorney, calls and wants to know what they intend to do. He gives his advice freely—better think twice and go back North. From the incubator set with two hundred eggs, fifty chicks come forth and with the New Year a norther which freezes them. While Eleanor and Bahama strew leaves over their bodies, a man in livery and on horseback appears with a bag filled with quail and mallards from the lake, presenting them with Mr. Muir's compliments. Eleanor refuses the gift—not knowing Mr. Muir, and later she sees through a tangled hedge a man pass on horseback. It is Mr. Muir, whose picture is printed on her heart.

CHAPTER IV.

YOUNG Mr. Muir sent no more gifts of game for a while. Nancy thought Eleanor's frigid reception of the friendly bag of birds had put a stop to any more attempts at friendship. Possibly such would have been the case if David Muir had not met his new neighbor—of whose identity he was quite unaware—one day on the road, and immediately recognized her as the girl for whom he had gathered the wild grapes in the autumn.

In an instant a beautiful smile flashed over the young man's frank face; his hand went at once to his cap, and his sunny blue eyes sought his new neighbor's appealingly.

The delicate coloring of Eleanor's fair face deepened into a most becoming rose, and her eyes, brown, glinted with gold like star-dust, looked from their delicate, deep-fringed lids straight into the blue ones that looked down so eagerly; straight into them, and through them, as if she saw, not the man on horseback, but the woods and fields beyond him!

Straight on she walked, without turning her head, without sign or token of possible recognition—the stubborn pride of her race, bitter from supposed humiliation, refused to know the alien who had come among them to flaunt his fortune in the faces of the poverty-stricken owners of the land.

Young David Muir—a simple soul, without a hint of snobbery in his wholesome nature, looked wistfully at the graceful, erect figure as it moved, with the mein of a princess of the blood royal, down the road and out of his sight behind a bend of overhanging trees.

"Well, I'll be darned!" ejaculated the "rich Yankee," with a little whistle of subdued amazement. "She is a beauty, all right—and proud as Lucifer, evidently. I've seen that face in my dreams ever since that day I picked those grapes—thought she was some city girl that I'd never see again. And then she looked so—so different, somehow. By George! If I could just see that charming, altogether adorable smile she gave me when I broke those sour little fox-grapes! And she's the heiress of that old rat-trap—and she sent back my game—too proud to accept favors, of course. Well, we'll see!"

And he rode on, whistling a lilting little tune that was very joyous and hopeful—characteristic of the nature of David Muir of Green Lands, which was the happily named estate of the "half-strainer."

It was not long after this before the entire household of the big place came down from the North in a hurry, heralding the arrival of the mistress and the guests she usually brought with her. And, shortly after her arrival, accompanied by the usual retinue of the rich, Nancy had some exciting news to write her John, who, from a perverse change of territory, found that he could not work his way up to the Talcott plantation till later; Nancy found much consolation in writing to her sweetheart a full account of everything that took place—it took her mind away from brooding over her surroundings, she declared to him as an excuse for her voluminous missives.

"John o' my heart" (wrote Nancy), "we've sure had happenings, or, to speak correctly, a happening, since I last wrote you (having nothing else in the world to do, and being deadly tired of the monotony). The Lady of Green Lands has called upon us—or, properly speaking, upon Eleanor, the Chatelaine of Castle Talcott.

"She came in style—of course, stupid, I mean Mrs. Muir, the lady who lives upon her mammoth estate next door, so to speak, and not Eleanor, poor child! In a limousine which, I am credibly informed by Mr. Jake Louder, who was himself credibly informed by the chauffeur, cost, f. o. b. Paris (of course in France!), twenty thousand dollars, and some odd ones that Mr. Louder frankly acknowledged he couldn't recollect.

"It had rained and rained and then rained some more. Everything was sopping, and in the big old drawing-room there were tubs and buckets set galore to catch the drippings—it would have been plumb (note the word, please) suicidal to take guests in such a place, and our only fire was in the bedroom we occupy—a big, sunny—when there is sun—room, fairly cheerful even when the skies have been weeping for weeks.

"We were engaged in mending and darning our tablecloth—only one we have for possible company—which never comes—we eat on some powerful (note) pretty crocheted mats, ourselves, when Aunt Daphne, who floats when she moves, being positively buoyed up by fat like a cork—came drifting in and informed us that the rich Yankees' big car was right at the door and Mrs. Muir and young Mr. Muir getting out! And where in name o' sense was Daphne to take 'em, seeing that the dro'in-room was sopping, and nary spark o' fire in the dining-room.

"Then my Eleanor, palely beautiful, her queenly head erect, spoke calmly—positively calmly, though I was all of a flurry, I'll frankly admit. 'Aunt Daphne, bring them in here,' she said, in that sweet voice of hers that is a most excellent thing in a woman, as Shakespeare and I both agree.

"'Eleanor!' I gasped, 'right in our bedroom!' 'Certainly,' said Eleanor, smooth as silk, 'where else are we to take them, Nancy? It is not hospitable to let people freeze—we must give them the best we have—since they have come!'

"Aunt Daphne ushered them in, both rather bewildered, but Eleanor received them like a young princess in her throne-room—she positively did, Johnboy! The lady—a middle-aged, rather nice looking person, dressed quietly but, oh, so richly!—graciously introduced herself and her son, who is a dandy looking fellow, and a good pal, I know; he and I grew quite chummy while his mother was trying to be gracious to Eleanor and finding the tables turned, for it was Eleanor who was gracious to her, in that same young-princess-in-her-ancestral-halls manner with which she greeted her guests.

"Mrs. Muir was cold, one could see at a glance, and she held out her hands with a grateful little shiver toward the blaze. Eleanor poked the fire and calmly reached for a big log in the wood-box, quite as a matter-of-course, but young Muir sprang like an arrow from a bow and forestalled her; the Suzeraine of the Chateau allowed him, as she would have allowed Uncle Bahama, and thanked him just as she would have thanked our ancient servitor—she didn't so much as smile the teeniest, weeniest smile, though he looked at her as if he quite expected it. Indeed, she looked right through him all the time of the visit, which was not prolonged beyond the requirements of etiquette.

"Mrs. Muir's eyes roved covetously towards our big, ten-acre bed, and our high-backed chairs, and our chest of drawers and our fine old brass fender, and the things that are worth good money to the rich, but nothing, alas, to us!

"She did so in a quiet, unostentatious manner, while talking smoothly about how glad she was to have young neighbors, and how pleased she and her son would be to have us visit them, and how if there was anything she could do, to please let her know. And wouldn't we come over, just at any time, and take pot-luck with them?

"She said that in the way I use my Southern words (if that's one I never heard it), as if she wanted to be thought to the manner born, though she did originally come from the great Empire State of the Union, and ought to have been proud of the fact. "Just in the delightfully unconventional manner of Southerners, you know," she smiled at Eleanor, who gravely and with simple dignity thanked her. Just thanked her, and nothing more! I knew in my mind, alas! that we'd never, never go and take pot-luck at that bountiful table, and taste once more before we die real, red meat, and real hothouse fruits, and real, wild-wood's game, and other things too numerous to mention—maybe including real ice cream!

"They went out and got back in their luxurious limousine and purred softly down the avenue of ragweeds, and out on to the road, while we, dazed and overcome with the mere atmosphere of their vanished presence—at least I was overcome—sat and stared into the fire, and looked at each other to see if were dreaming or awake.

"'They're nice,' I finally uttered, emphatically. 'I don't know what you think, Eleanor, but they are nice people, those two. And we ought to be friendly with them.'

"The poor little thing looked at me with such anguish in her eyes that my heart ached. 'Nancy, oh, Nancy, can't you see how it is?' she kind of moaned, 'if it was like the old days—if we had a decent, well-kept house, and plenty of food, we could afford to be friendly—even with them. But I can't—bare self-respect prevents me accepting their favors, and returning their visits. They don't care for us—it is all just condescension—they don't think we are their equals. Nancy, honey, I just can't be patronized by anybody. As things are now, we and the Muirs can never be friends and neighbors in the real sense of the word. They'll just live near us—we can't help that—but we won't see any more of them, I hope!' And John-dear, she positively sighed in the most heartbreaking way when she said it. I believe in my soul she'd be glad to know 'em, if she wasn't so—excuse the word—darned proud!

"Well, in a day or two after this visit there came more offerings—game, fruit from the hothouses, early vegetables, crisp and melting—my mouth just watered at the bare sight of them, for my prophetic soul told me that I'd never, no never, taste one of the strawberries, or a leaf of the lettuce, or a melting mouthful of red, ripe tomato, or a bite of delicious duck, or a—a quid of quail, or anything else alluring or alliterative in the line of gifts.

"She sent them back! So she did, every blessed one of 'em, with a pale little smile of renunciation that showed how much she suffered in doing so—not for herself, but for me, and Uncle Bahama, and Aunt Daphne, whose souls, she knows, hunger after fleshpots (if you dare to send me a box of eats I'll murder you on sight!)

"'I can't accept gifts when I have nothing in kind to return,' she said, with such an imploring, please-forgive-me look in her eyes, that I hugged her on the spot, and we went in to our lunch of young greens—our garden patch is great on greens, which is about all that Uncle Bahama seems able to raise in the way of truck—hoe-cake, sweet potatoes and boiled middling. Oh, Lord—when I think of those ducks and quail!

"But something tells me—I think I inherited the gift of second-sight from some unknown Scotch forebear—that we shall see more of that young man, Mr. David Muir, Millionaire. He has a wishful look in his eyes, and they were turned Eleanorward, my jo-John, if you have any doubts as to the direction of their gaze. Yes; I certainly feel that we shall know more of him.

"Your hint of a raise in view does not tempt me, John, darling, one little bit—I'm not going to leave Eleanor till I know there is no chance of persuading her to give up this life and go back with us to the city, where we belong. Still, I don't mind telling you, before I forget it, that I'm wearying for a sight of a certain roly-poly (somewhat) jolly, big-hearted, altogether adorable drummer-man by the name of John Douglas Carr, and that if the aforesaid J. D. C. ever comes up this way the latch is on the string of the temporary abode of "His own, forever and always,

"NANCY DARE."

Nancy's prophetic soul had told her truly—she saw David Muir upon the very day that she went down the road to the mail-box to drop in her letter to John Carr.

He was walking leisurely along the tangled wire-grass that bordered the roadside, his hands in his pockets, a stubby black pipe in his mouth, and rather a dolorous expression upon his handsome face.

"Good morning," greeted Nancy, with the "come hither" smile in her eyes that was irresistible to both sexes—men and women naturally fell in love with Nancy at first sight; to both she was "a jolly good fellow."

"I hate these 'misty, moisty mornings,' don't you?" she queried, as the young man, visibly brightening, approached. "I want sunshine—though Uncle Bahama does say it's good to get

A Reason for Thanksgiving

By C. L. Chapman

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

FOR what we are about to receive this Thanksgiving Day let us be truly thankful. Let us remember all the reasons we have for being thankful and forget all the reasons for being anything else.

A large part of the world is in a period of gloom, but we in America have much to be thankful for. An unprecedented era of prosperity is dawning on this country and will burst upon us as soon as our people settle down to business and accept the wonderful opportunity that is knocking at the Nation's door.

In the year 1799 America was taking a very gloomy view of itself. Times were hard, money scarce, some people could not earn a living, and as our own philosopher and economist, Benjamin Franklin wrote: "Be quiet and thankful."

What we need now is to stop industrial strife, be thankful and go to work, producing instead of striking.

Thanksgiving has ceased to be the day of solemn religious ceremony observed by the Pilgrims. If, with its ceremony, it has lost the old spirit and has become merely an occasion for feasting in pleasant company, then it is a change to be deplored. If, on the other hand it has become a day not only to count one's own blessings but to give a few to those less favored, we need not feel ashamed of the modern method of celebrating Thanksgiving.

It is the day for the most generous hospitality, the day not only for delightful family reunions, but for gathering in a few lonesome souls who no longer have families or who are stranded too far from home to make the journey a possible one.

To those who add to the hospitality of their own tables by sending baskets groaning with the good things to families who might find it difficult to discover a cause for gratitude otherwise, should express their prayers of thanksgiving in terms fraught with blessings to themselves as well as to others and have fully earned the privilege of enjoying their family dinners with their loved ones about them.

The origin of Thanksgiving may be traced back through the ages to the land of the Canaanites, for they gathered in the harvest and celebrated it by eating and drinking.

The same festival was celebrated by the Hebrews, they calling it the Feast of the Tabernacle, it being the principal celebration of the Jewish year.

The harvest festival of ancient Greece was much like the Jewish Feast of the Tabernacle and was celebrated by women only.

The Romans worshiped their harvest deity Ceres.

In England the autumnal festival was called Harvest Home, which has been traced back to the time of the early Saxons. In addition to the fixed autumnal festivals, extraordinary festivals were proclaimed in England upon special occasions such as the defeat of the Spanish Armada, the discovery of the Guy Fawkes "gunpowder plot," and the recovery of George III from his fit of insanity. In fact, the days of thanksgiving grew so numerous and so hilarious as to interfere with the more serious affairs of life.

"There is a tradition, that in the planting of New England," wrote Benjamin Franklin, "the first settlers met with many hardships, many difficulties, as is generally the case when a civilized people attempt establishing themselves in a wilderness country. Being piously disposed, they sought relief from Heaven, in laying their wants and distresses before the Lord, in frequent set days of fasting and prayer. Constant meditation and discourse on these subjects kept their minds gloomy and discontented, and, like the children of Israel, there were many disposed to return to that Egypt which persecution had induced them to abandon. At length, it was proposed in the assembly to proclaim another fast, when a farmer of plain sense rose and remarked that the inconveniences they suffered and concerning which they had so often wearied Heaven with their complaints, were not so great as they might have expected, and were diminishing every day as the colony strengthened, that the earth began to reward their labor and furnish liberally for their subsistence; that the seas and rivers were full of fish, the air sweet, the climate healthy, and, above all, that they were there in the full enjoyment of liberty, civil and religious. He, therefore, thought that reflecting and conversing on these subjects would be more comfortable as tending more to make them contented with their situation, and that it would be more becoming the gratitude they owed the Divine Being if, instead of a fast, they should proclaim a Thanksgiving.

"His advice was taken, and from that day to this they have in every year observed circumstances of felicity sufficient to furnish employment of a Thanksgiving Day, which is therefore constantly ordered and religiously observed."

The same spirit should animate our people today, and they have far greater reason for it, for the only troubles that face them now are of their own making. The world markets are calling for our products and every industry is prospering except those that are tied up by strikes.

the ground's face washed before you put in the corn."

"Fine weather for birds," replied young Mr. Muir, with a critical glance at the sky. "I say, Miss Dare," he continued, with frank abruptness, "why does Miss Talcott treat us poor Yankees with so much frigidity? Why does she scorn us as neighbors, who'd be neighborly, if she'd let us; and flout us as friends, when we're trying to carry out the Apostle Paul's precepts to show ourselves friendly. Can you tell me?"

"Why—er—" hesitated Nancy, stumbling for an answer to this impetuous demand, but he interrupted her.

"Do you know when I first saw Miss Talcott? It was away last fall, when I had run down to the place for a day before leaving for the West. See that vine hanging down—measley little fox-grapes? Well, she was trying her best to reach 'em; I saw, and—naturally—stopped and broke off a handful of bunches for her. And, Miss Dare, I swear to you, it doesn't seem possible, after the 'splendidly null' face with which she greeted mother and me, but she smiled like—the sun. She was radiant, and beautiful, and altogether adorable looking. I'd give a good bit to see that look on her face once more. Reckon I can ever make it come back?"

"For pity's sake!" cried Nancy, "did you see her last fall? Why, she didn't say a word about you—not a word!"

"Didn't make enough impression for her to remember me," gloomily observed David Muir. "But I remembered her, all right! Thought she was some city girl—you could see she was a city girl by her manner, and the graceful cut of her clothes, you know; and I didn't think I'd ever see her again. But I tell you I've thought of her a—a—"

"A right smart?" dimpled Nancy, with a twinkle in her eyes—the eyes that looked like his own. "That's what Uncle Bahama or Aunt Daphne would say, when doubtful about a choice of words to express what you evidently want to say. You know, we Yankees—I'm sure that my appearance must suggest baked beans, Boston and culture to everybody—we Yankees, when we come down South, are mighty apt to pick up the darkies' sayings as belonging to the F. F.'s—the Fust Families."

"Yes; I may say I've thought about that face a right smart," nodded David Muir, with an answering twinkle. "And the sight of you suggests a very lovely young lady, who is also a mighty good pal to the friends she chooses."

"Thanks," acknowledged Nancy, gravely. There was not a hint of the coquetry of which Eleanor accused her in eyes or voice, "I like for you to say that!"

"And I'd like—oh, immensely, to be honored with your friendship," continued David Muir, eagerly. "Even though Miss Talcott will have none of me," he added, wistfully.

"All right," agreed Nancy, holding out a friendly hand which he grasped heartily, "I'll promise to be—an ally? Is that what you want?" And she smiled understandingly. "But I don't know that I can be of much use, in that way. You know, as old Bahama says, 'We quality-folks is powerful poor, but we's powerful proud!' I find that the same applies to 'quality-folks' of a different complexion."

"I won't dare come a-visiting again," smiled the other, "and I won't dare send gifts—to Miss Talcott, that is, but mayn't I to you?"

"No—mercy me, no!" cried Nancy, in dismay. "Because, you know, it would just break poor Eleanor's heart to know how much I'd enjoy 'em."

"Then, maybe I could come to see—you?" hesitated David Muir, but Nancy promptly and decisively shook her head.

"You can't do that," she said, "greatly as I'd like it. For I don't mind telling you that I'm engaged to a man in the hardware business, who's merely waiting for a raise—a drummer, in other words, and the dearest fellow on this terrestrial ball. If you were to come—ostensibly—to see me, Eleanor'd never forgive me—she'd think I was false to poor John, and utterly unworthy of his heart! But I'll meet you clandestinely, Mr. Muir, whenever I can, so long as it is on the public road and in the broad daylight;" and Nancy laughed at the thought of such meetings being termed clandestine.

"I think that drummer-man is to be greatly envied," said Mr. Muir, with a smile of congratulation. "I wish I knew him—and I wish I were in the hardware business, so that I could give him the necessary raise. And I sincerely appreciate the 'clandestine' meetings you're to allow me!"

Lifting his hat with rather a rueful smile, David Muir passed on to where his groom awaited with horse and gun, and Nancy, sighing a bit for the flesh-pots of her neighbor, slipped John's letter in the rural delivery box, stuck up the flag, and went back to the pleasant fire which Daphne, the light-footed, managed to keep glowing brightly and warmly, with the twigs and rotten branches of the old trees in the grove. Daphne was a treasure for which Eleanor and Nancy gave daily thanks.

Mrs. Muir, as a matter of course, called no more during her brief stay at Green Lands, for Eleanor did not return her visit. The mistress of the big place returned, with her retinue of servants and her houseful of guests, in a few weeks, to her home in the North. David Muir stayed on till the hunting season was over, in the early spring.

Many times he and Nancy met "clandestinely," holding pleasant converse in friendly fashion about many topics of common interest, and always ending by discussing Eleanor, and her stubborn pride which was, declared Nancy, ruefully, getting stronger all the time.

"I wonder," wistfully pondered David Muir, "how long it will be before she'll meet me as an equal? Just now I feel immeasurably her inferior—and I think she so considers me."

"Don't you believe it," declared Nancy, "she'd be only too glad to meet you as an equal—to have you and your mother for friends, if she could do so without realizing her poverty. If she were as rich as her folks were in the old days—my sakes! we'd surely have good times, for Eleanor is the soul of hospitality. But you know, my dear child, that one naturally doesn't want to dine with Lucullus on mallard and quail, and invite him to a feast of rabbit and corn-bread."

"She needn't invite me to dinner, if you consider me a Lucullus—all I want is to see her and talk to her—evenings would be fine. And, now that the mater's gone home, of course I can't invite her to dine, you know."

"Oh, you literal young simpleton!" sighed Nancy, with an affectionate pat on his coat-sleeve. "I like you a heap, boy, but I can't give you any encouragement in the matter of Eleanor—not unless a miracle were to happen."

"Well, I'm obliged to go home tomorrow," the young man replied, soberly. "But I'll come back—and I'm thinking maybe I won't wait for the shooting in the fall. Maybe something'll happen to soften the princess—I'm a great believer in the old adage: 'If at first you don't succeed, try, try again!' I learned it at school, when I was six, and it's the only poetry I can remember—I try to live up to it, too."

So David Muir went back to the North, and the days passed uneventfully on the Talcott plantation. But at last something happened that was, Nancy declared, the very last straw—the camel's back was smashed to smithereens!

Neddy, the mule, feeling the springtime in his veins, leaped friskily over the frail fence that confined him, one beautiful night when the moon was bright, and wandered abroad to seek new forage, finding it in the greenly growing fields beloning to the Muir estate!

When Bahama went to his stall next morning, he found Neddy in the throes of acute indigestion from the unaccustomed diet of the night.

Bahama trotted to the house as fast as his old legs would carry him, to tell the woeful tidings to Eleanor. "Dat muel is done eat sump'n didn't 'gree wid him, Miss Eleanor, and he powerful bad off wid de colic," panted Bahama. "Don' you reckon I better run down to Mr. Jake Louder's store and ax him for some pain-killer?"

The two girls were at breakfast; Daphne, drifting in with a plate of delicious corn-meal batter-cakes, promptly responded.

"Mr. Louder don't know what to do for mules no more'n me," quoth Daphne, the capable. "I'll go fix up a drench right now—red-pepper tea, gunpowder and bakin'-soda. Ain't you got no sense, Bahama, dat you done forgot how we-all used to doctor our stock—when we had stock on de plantation?"

"Been so long I done forgot," declared the relieved Bahama. "But you better hurry up, ole 'oman, for dat muel is powerful bad off."

"You kin rub him id a rail whiles I makin' de drench," calmly informed his spouse, as she glided lightly away in the direction of the kitchen.

"Nancy, oh, Nancy, do you reckon Neddy will die?" whispered Eleanor, with tragic eyes. "What would we do if he were to die right in the beginning of the season?"

"Well, seeing that he's only making corn for his own forage, I don't know that it would matter greatly," said Nancy, with what Eleanor considered unkind flippancy. "It might prove to be a blessing in disguise, honey!"

But Neddy did not die, though he came pretty close to the danger line, Bahama—who tried osteopathy upon him with a rail—declared. Daphne's drench was so horrible that Neddy—after his head was tied up with a rope, and the bottle containing the drench forced between his teeth by Daphne, who had to stand in the feed-trough to reach him—forgot his stomach-ache in the greater pain of the awful dose.

"He's all right now," declared Daphne, as she climbed warily down from her perch in the feed-trough. "He'll be as good as new in about an hour or so."

"Thank heaven!" breathed Eleanor, relievedly. She and Nancy had stood near, watching the administering of the dose with fearful interest, but powerless to aid. "But what in the world gave him the colic, Uncle Bahama?"

"Dis here fence is done smashed in where he jumped over," decided Daphne, critically viewing the demolished rails that had kept Neddy within bounds. "I reckon he done got in somebody's fiel' and eat too much green stuff."

Bahama scratched his head thoughtfully. "De Lord knows I hope he ain't got into none o' dat Yankee white man's patches," he exclaimed, with fervor. "I ain't got no use for a poor-white Yankee like dat air overseer what Mr. Muir got, dat I ain't! I hope Neddy done gone on down to Mr. Jake Louder's, caze he won't be apt to charge for de corn, or whatsomever he eat up."

"I'll certainly pay damages," declared Eleanor, and Nancy averred that if such were the case, it would be the first time Mr. Louder didn't charge!

But alas! as Neddy already knew, and Bahama's guess proved true; it was not in the patch of Mr. Louder but in the highly-tilled fields belonging to the Muir plantation that the damage was wrought, as Eleanor was soon to know.

The manager of Green Lands rode over as soon as he had visited his fields and found out the extent of Neddy's depredations. He was not a gentleman, by birth, breeding or instinct, this "poor-white Yankee," but he was a most excellent employee, and he looked well after the ways of the plantation, and the interests of his employer.

Eleanor, watching the languid Neddy convalescing in his lot, beheld the approach of the overseer, Bahama trailing at his heels, with secret dismay, though her delicate face betrayed no token of her feelings. The dainty head held its usual proud poise, the velvet-brown eyes looked calmly upon the irate overseer, who briefly informed her that he came to say the damage her mule had done to the young crops amounted to at least a hundred dollars!

"The old rascal got in the garden," explained the manager, "and has devoured young vegetables that can't be replaced—too late to replant. We raise them early to ship North, to Mrs. Muir. Lettuce, young peas, carrots—everything in ruins, for what he couldn't eat he trampled on, so that they are crushed and useless. What are you going to do about it, ma'am?"

"She certainly is not going to take your appraisal," flashed Nancy, fire in her eyes and wrath in her heart, which fluttered with fear at the thought that perhaps Eleanor would take the man's valuation of his crops, after all—Eleanor had such quixotic ideas of right and wrong! "Somebody else will have to set a value on the things, of course."

And then Eleanor did just what Nancy, in her secret heart, feared she would do!

"I take it for granted that you speak the truth," she said, in calm, icy tones," and that you have set a just value on your vegetables. Wait here, and I will write you a check for the amount."

And, just as though she had a fortune in the bank, Eleanor walked calmly into the house, wrote the check, and—oblivious of Nancy's pitiful protests, handed it to the man with the air of a royal princess who bestows a favor upon a subject!

The manager received it in much the manner a subject would have done, for he, amazed at the sight of the check—which he had not the slightest idea of receiving—felt that this graciously proud lady who gave checks so readily, must be masquerading—she must have money, even though she chose to live in such a forsaken hole as the old Talcott house!

But Eleanor, knowing the pitiful balance left when the hundred dollar check should be cashed, knew that the end was in sight—sooner or later she must tell Nancy to go away to her John, and her work in the big city, and leave her alone—

Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

Types of Clutches

BECAUSE the power must be applied gradually, friction type of clutches are generally used in connection with the gasolene internal combustion motor. A few types of magnetic clutches have also appeared on some makes of cars. However, this type might be considered as in its experimental stage and, therefore, will not be taken into consideration at this time. The friction clutch may be found in various forms. The type is considered ideal as it permits a certain amount of slipping before taking hold, thereby applying the power or drive gradually. On the other hand, if the clutch did not yield to a certain extent and applied the load immediately, the result would be hard on the entire driving mechanism and objectionable to the occupants of the car. The effect obtained with this type of clutch could be compared to the bucking of a bronco. The cone clutch is the simplest of the friction series. It consists of a large cup, sometimes formed in the flywheel, and a cone to register with the cup. The cup is referred to as the female member and is always attached to the engine. The cone is referred to as the male member and is coupled to drive the transmission. Usually the cone is fitted with a leather facing which is treated to insure gradual engagement with the cup. When the clutch is in the driving position, the two members (cup and cone) are held together by spring tension. When the clutch pedal is depressed the linkage moves the cone away from the cup, thereby allowing the engine to turn over without transmitting the power through the gear set to the rear wheels. The disc type of friction clutch is the one most generally adopted by automobile engineers. This type usually consists of two sets of discs, one set having a facing on each side of the disc and the other set without facings. When assembling, the plain discs are placed between the lined ones. The first is a lined disc, the second plain, the third lined, and so on. The lined discs usually have teeth cut on their periphery and fit into guides cut in the flywheel. In other words, whenever the engine turns over, the lined discs must revolve. The plain or unlined discs are attached to a driven member which in turn is coupled to the transmission. When the clutch is in the driving position the lined and plain discs are pressed against each other by spring tension. It will be appreciated that the friction created in this manner will be sufficient to communicate the drive to the gear-set. By depressing the clutch pedal, the spring tension is released, and naturally the plain discs fall away from the lined ones. In this manner it is possible for the engine to revolve without load. Some disc clutches use but three plates while others incorporate several. There are two types of disc clutches; the wet and the dry. The term "dry multiple disc clutch" is descriptive in itself. The wet disc clutch differs from the dry in that the discs run in a bath of oil. The advantage claimed for this arrangement is that the act of squeezing out the film of oil on the plates when they are engaging causes a certain amount of slipping and insures gradual engagement. The types of clutches described have been in use for years and are very efficient.

Some Useful Pointers

Retreading Tires

When the soles of your shoes are worn thin, do you throw the shoes away? Unless you are extravagant you do not. Instead, you send the shoes to a repairer and have new soles put on. The same principle should hold good as regards the tires on the car. The rubber tread on the outside of the tire is the only part which touches the road and therefore is more susceptible to wear than any other part of the tire. Many owners are of the opinion that when the tread is gone it is time to buy new tires. The supposition is correct, providing the owner has not taken care of the tire during the period of use. The only purpose of the rubber tread is to take the wear of the road and in no way assists in withstanding the air pressure. The pressure is taken by the fabric or cords under the tread. If the fabric and cords are in good condition, what argument can there be against putting on a new tread, and, thereby, lengthening materially the life of a tire. However, if there are sand blisters on the tire or cuts which expose the fabric, the chances are that the fabric has started to deteriorate at those particular points and the condition may not warrant the expense of a new tread. The fabric must be preserved and this is accomplished by vulcanizing any cuts in the tread, maintaining a proper air pressure and not overloading the car. If these precautions have been taken, do not throw the tire away because the tread is worn, but have it inspected by a tire expert as a new tread may mean several thousands of miles additional service. There are also several inner liners on the market which have been time tried and found to give excellent results. The fabric liner is cemented inside the old shoe and with this arrangement it is possible to use the tire until its fabric is worn through. In most instances the liner may be removed and cemented into another casing. It is also claimed that due to the extra thickness of fabric a tire equipped with an inner liner is almost immune from punctures.

Loss of Power

When loss of power is noticed, any of the following may be the cause: brakes set, improper carburetor adjustment, carbonization of the cylinders, excessive heat, lack of oil, flooded carburetor or lack of compression.

Engine Overheating

Should the engine have a tendency to overheat, any of the following might be the cause: fan belt loose or broken, driving with retarded spark, ignition incorrectly timed, valves incorrectly timed, carburetor out of adjustment, sediment in radiator, water pump impellor broken, obstructions in front of radiator, lack of oil, dragging brakes, slipping clutch or racing engine on low gear. To determine whether the water is circulating, remove the radiator cap and while the motor is running, see whether there is a good delivery into the upper tank of the radiator.

Ammeter Troubles

In case the ammeter should show a flow of current (the indicator finger is not at zero) when all the switches are turned off, it is always advisable to determine first if the ammeter is at fault. This is accomplished by disconnecting all wires attaching to the ammeter and noting whether the reading continues the same or if the finger returns to zero. If, when the instrument is taken out of the electrical circuit, the reading is not changed, the trouble lies in the instrument and should receive expert attention. If, on the other hand, the finger returns to zero, the trouble does not lie in the ammeter and the car wiring should be examined thoroughly for short circuits.

Should the ammeter ever show a discharge reading when it should be showing a charge reading—that is, the reading is discharged when the generator is running and charge when it is idle—the indication is that the connections somewhere in the circuit have been switched. It may be that the wires were not attached to the proper terminals at the ammeter. Although such a condition can do no harm, to avoid confusion it is better to locate the switched wires and correct the difficulty.

Stubborn Valve Cap

Many times a valve cap which has not been disturbed for a long time will resist all efforts to dislodge it. One of the easiest methods for handling a stubborn valve cap is to run the motor until it is thoroughly warmed up and then pour cold water in the cup portion of the cap. The water causes the contraction of the cap and if a wrench be applied immediately the cap can be turned out.

Magnetized Tools

Even the small boy knows that a piece of steel or iron will stick to the end of the horseshoe magnet. It therefore will not require much thought on the part of the motorist to understand that if certain tools be magnetized much time and temper can be saved when doing certain work on the automobile. For example: rub a strong horseshoe magnet over the end of a long screw-driver, which will instantly become magnetized. Small screws difficult to handle with the fingers will adhere to the end of the screw-driver, also small metal parts dropped in the underpan can readily be extracted without waste of time or soiling the workman's clothing.

Questions Answered

I am troubled by the water boiling in the radiator of my 1916 model Chevriolet car. Is it caused by imperfect circulation? If I should install a new radiator would it remedy the difficulty?

G. D. C., Denver, Ill.

There are several probable causes for the overheating of your motor. Perhaps the most common is due to the distributor being timed late. The distributor should be timed so that the breaker points open at the exact time the piston reaches its uppermost position on the compression stroke. The fault is sometimes found due to the carburetor being adjusted for too rich a mixture. However, if the motor operates properly, the chances are that the trouble is not due to the carburetor. Make certain that the fan belt is tight. It might be advisable to bend the fan blades a trifle so as to cause more cool air to pass through the radiator. Care must be exercised, however, not to bend the blades to the extent which will allow them to strike the radiator. It might be to your advantage to remove the pet cock at the bottom of the water connection and after the water is all drained out to thoroughly flush the radiator and water jacket in the motor with pressure from a garden hose. This would remove all sediment which might collect in the radiator. After this is done, the pet cock should be replaced and the radiator filled with water. Start motor and allow it to run until water at top of radiator becomes hot. If the water does not circulate properly it would remain cold at the bottom of radiator for a long time. In case the water does not circulate through the radiator, the radiator should be removed and sent to the manufacturer for repair. The manufacturer's name is stamped on the metal plate on the back of radiator.

There are factories where they make fences, furniture, screen doors, baskets, suspenders, gloves and knitting mills.

Wishing good luck to all of COMFORT'S readers,
MRS. WM. FIDDLER.

WALKER, ARIZONA.

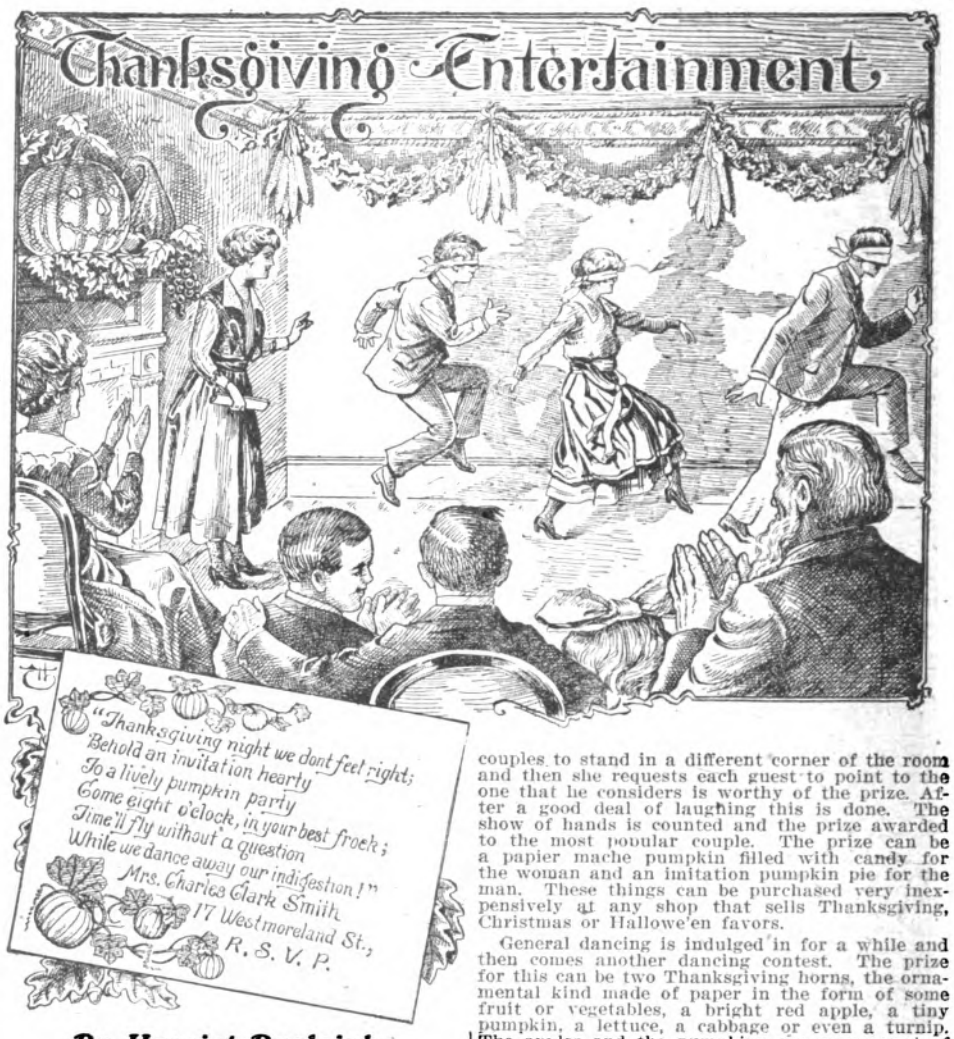
DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

May I come in and talk with you for there are many things I want to say.

I should like to discuss the beauties of nature with Busy Girl for I love nature in all her moods. When a child in the east (New York) I, too, loved the old orchard. I live now in the mountains of Arizona with a creek singing its song just below my house—which I am building myself. Busy Girl, if you live up to your letter your life should be filled with happiness.

The request in March COMFORT from the editor: "What did you with little money do to make your home more beautiful?" I got a hammer and saw and went to work. Were you ever in a mining camp? Do you know the kind of cabins most of the families live in? Have you seen the countless thousands of tin cans thrown in most of the back yards? If so, then you know what I mean when I say I went to work. One of our richest blessings is home and we can't do too much to improve and beautify it. Our homes show our personalities, the outside even more than the inside is seen by many and they get their impressions from it. If you own your home you can work wonders at small cost. Look the house over and see where you can build a porch or screened living-room for there is nothing which appeals to me more than a cozy, open living-room, free from flies, with a few comfortable rockers, an easy couch and a table for books and papers. If you have no fireplace, build a big chimney of rocks on the outside of the house and use rocks inside if you are where rocks "grow." Make a driveway at one side and a side entrance with a little porch over it. Look the outside of your home over and see where the shape of the rooms can be improved upon; where a partition can be taken out between sitting-room and parlor, making a big living-room. Build a fireplace with a seat at one side large enough to lie down upon and rest. At the other side build in a writing desk and bookcase. Don't forget the little things so much needed at a desk, a penknife that will sharpen pencils, paper cutter, ruler, ink eraser, mucilage, calendar, pens and ink, and a waste-basket. Have a library table for the reading lamp and magazines and comfortable chairs or rockers for each member of the family. Have handy a little sewing table for your work. If your husband smokes, as mine does, have beside his chair a small cabinet for his tobacco and matches, with a place for his book. Have plenty of windows, the more the better. Brown is a beautiful color for a living-room but the room must be well lighted or the effect will be dingy and unpleasant. A rug in brown, light tan, old rose and blue looks well in a room with the side walls, two shades of brown with portieres and window draperies of plain or figured material to match light colors in rug. Have a few good pictures. The kitchen needs special planning so that it won't be necessary to take too many steps in doing the work. Your work table and dish closets should be in one place and a built-in cabinet by the stove so your tea, coffee and breakfast foods are where you use them and it makes a place to set things while cooking.

When fixing up your guest room don't forget a small writing desk for as a rule the guest wants to write home and tell the folks she arrived safely and is having the loveliest time.



All these things may sound expensive but they are not. If you or any member of the family are handy with tools you can make many pieces of furniture that are useful and good looking. Because it requires work is the reason so many homes go unbeautified but if you get started it won't be long before the rest of the family will get interested.

There are places where you can send your old carpets and clothing and have made them into good-looking and long-wearing rugs at a small cost.

If you don't understand exactly what will be suitable, get a bungalow book and study the most attractive designs. Have lots of windows. Does the house need paint? So many don't seem to realize that to keep their buildings well painted is business and makes the buildings last much longer. Improvements make your property worth more and more salable. To be beautiful everything must be well kept, lawn, flowers, vines and trees. Don't have unsightly places in your back yard, a wood pile, tin cans or ashes. If you have an outside earth toilet, use your ashes in it and keep it spread thickly so flies can't breed there. The lye in the ashes kills the germs. Dig a deep pit with smooth sides, bank the outside well and keep tight. Make covers for seats and keep covered. Safety first. Protect your family from the terribly contagious diseases that come from such places, particularly through fly season, which is most of the year around in the West. Millions of these filthy insects breed in this filth and then go directly to your dining-room and kitchen and track over your food, into the baby's milk and over its face while on their feet are millions of deadly germs. Uncle Sam is working hard to improve the health standard so it's up to each one of us to help him. The heart of the world is health, happiness, home and beauty.

I have lived in different mining towns for the last five years and at one mine they gave us a tent house, twelve by fourteen feet, to live in and it was nearly ready to fall to pieces from age and neglect. I stood it three weeks and then I got a saw and a hammer and went to work. Don't laugh, but they all did. It was boarded up four feet and the rest was canvas in

By Harriet Burleigh

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett Pub., Inc.

THE average state of mind on Thanksgiving Day is not unlike that of the hired man Kate Douglas Wiggin tells about in one of her early stories. This individual had a pronounced objection to getting up in the morning and, at last, he so exhausted the patience of even the good-natured "help" that she went to his room, banged on the door and said reprovingly, "Hiram, I should think you'd be ashamed to lay abed so late."

Whereat Hiram remarked, "I be ashamed but I'd ruther be ashamed than git up."

Now "the beatings of this observation stays in the application on it" as another famous writer once observed. We are all ashamed of over-eating and know perfectly well that such indulgence brings on indigestion, rheumatism and all sorts of ills, but on this one day in all the year everything tastes so good that we feel as if we should rather "be ashamed" than eat moderately.

For all sorts of table indiscretions, big or little, there is no more efficacious remedy than exercise and so it follows that the most thoroughly enjoyable entertainments for Thanksgiving evening are more or less lively ones.

Nowadays almost everybody dances and as this is really the most delightful way to exercise why not give a pumpkin dance on Thanksgiving night?

It adds to the general jollity of the occasion to send out very informal sorts of invitations. These are white cards embellished, top and bottom with big yellow pumpkins cut out of yellow paper and pasted on. Between the decorations is the following doggerel:

"Thanksgiving night we don't feel right;
Behold an invitation hearty
To a lively pumpkin party.
Come eight o'clock, in your best frock;
Time'll fly without a question
While we dance away our indigestion!"

Mrs. Charles Clark Smith,
17 Westmoreland St.,
R. S. V. P.

After reading such an invitation even the most conventional of guests feels that he must leave his stiffness at home and prepare for "high jinks" and this, naturally adds to the joy of the occasion.

Remove the rugs and most of the furniture from the living-room or whichever room in the house has the largest floor space but leave a few chairs ranged along the walls for the spectators. The floor should be waxed to make it suitable for dancing. The walls should be decorated like a harvest home festival with festoons of autumn leaves and ears of yellow corn arranged in effective groups between. On the center of the mantel stands a huge pumpkin hollowed out to form a grinning Jack-o'-lantern and on each side of this are banked egg plants, smaller pumpkins, crook necks, red apples, big bunches of Concord grapes and other fruits and vegetables of late autumn.

When the guests are all assembled let them have a preliminary dance to "break the ice" and then announce that during the first five minutes of the next music all the guests will kindly remain in their seats and admire the dancing of Miss Jones with Mr. Green, Mrs. White with Mr. West, etc., naming four couples, and that a prize will be given to the couple whose dancing is the most interesting to the company.

While the couples mentioned are gasping with surprise and beginning to murmur objections they were in complete ignorance of the ordeal in store for them—the hostess glibly continues that she hopes the first of the martyrs will come forward quickly as everyone in the room is to be called upon before the evening is over and therefore the first to suffer should congratulate themselves and remember that "he laughs best who laughs last."

If they enter properly into the spirit of the thing the dancers will try to interpolate a few fancy steps into the one step, the tango or whatever the first dance may be. A one-step is usually the best music to start with as this is such a simple dance it lends itself readily to variations.

At the end of five minutes a bell is rung and the hostess asks each of the four contesting couples to stand in a different corner of the room and then she requests each guest to point to the one that he considers is worthy of the prize. After a good deal of laughing this is done. The show of hands is counted and the prize awarded to the most popular couple. The prize can be a papier mache pumpkin filled with candy for the woman and an imitation pumpkin pie for the man. These things can be purchased very inexpensively at any shop that sells Thanksgiving, Christmas or Hallowe'en favors.

General dancing is indulged in for a while and then comes another dancing contest. The prize for this can be two Thanksgiving horns, the ornamental kind made of paper in the form of some fruit or vegetables, a bright red apple, a tiny pumpkin, a lettuce, a cabbage or even a turnip. The apples and the pumpkins are on account of their gay colors, by far the prettiest. There is a whistle in the mouth end of each of these horns and some of them emit an ear-splitting scream while others make a noise not unlike a very melancholy motor horn.

Let the contests continue until everybody in the room has taken part but do not let them get tiresome, run them in between the general dancing.

A very amusing Thanksgiving enterainment can be given for people who do not dance by using the same invitation card but substituting the word "laugh" for the word "dance" in the last line of the doggerel.

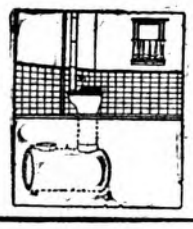
The first game after the guests have assembled is a pumpkin race, six or eight players can take part according to the size of the room. Procure the same number of very small yellow pumpkins—squashes will do, nobody but a farmer knows the difference or buy some tiny artificial pumpkins. Pin a long piece of tape on the floor for the race course of each pumpkin. The "stunt" is to see which of the contestants can chase the pumpkin along a line with the fewest strokes of a cane. Small prizes are given the successful contestant in each group and a grand prize is awarded to the persons who excels all others in the performance of this task. If preferred only this last prize can be given but it usually adds to the interest to give some little trifle at the completion of each contest.

Another very hilarious version of the pumpkin race is to have two players only race at a time instead of six or eight. Each is given a long-handled wooden spoon and a tiny pumpkin and then both have their eyes bandaged. The object of the contest is to see which of the two can roll the pumpkin across the floor first. As neither player can see where he or she is going the result is always very diverting to the spectators. A woman is matched against a man in this game until all have had a turn. The sex with most points to its credit then draws lots for the prize.

Stringing pumpkin seeds and colored beads together in necklaces is the next contest. A prize is awarded to the person who can make the most artistic necklace in a given time and the necklaces are kept by each contestant as a souvenir.

Then there is a left-handed contest and last of all an obstacle race. The first mentioned is very simple but none the less difficult for all that. Pencil and paper are given to each guest and each is asked to write a short message to the host or hostess with his left hand. A prize is given for the most legible writing. If any naturally left-handed people are present they must in all fairness be barred from this contest.

The obstacle race can end the evening with a hearty laugh at the expense of a few who certainly will not mind it. The hostess asks for volunteers for an obstacle race. A hassock, a rolled up rug, a low stool, a shirt-waist box, etc., are placed at uneven intervals along one side of the room. This makes the course and the idea, so the contestants are made to think, is to go around or jump over these things and see which one gets to the end of the room in the shortest space of time while he or she is blindfolded. After the course is all arranged each contestant is brought in before the bandage is adjusted over his eyes and allowed to see exactly what he is going to be up against. The wise contestant usually makes a mental picture of all the obstacles in the way and often he even paces them off to make sure of their exact locations when he is blindfolded. When everybody who is to take part has had this chance, the contestants are all sent into another room and their eyes blindfolded. In the meantime every hassock, rug, box or other obstacle has been removed from the course and there is nothing there. The contestants are admitted two or three at a time and give their word of honor not to cheat by looking under their bandages. They proceed cautiously, making long detours where the highest obstacles were and often jumping over the lowest ones. As these obstacles are by this time entirely imaginary the effect of all this is very funny. When they reach the end of the course the bandages are removed and the expression of bewilderment on each contestant's face when he sees the condition of affairs is very ludicrous.



For obvious reasons all refreshments served at Thanksgiving night festivities should be simple. Tiny individual pumpkin pies baked in patty pans should make the first course and the second can be ice-cream and cake with black coffee or lemonade. If orange ice, chocolate and vanilla cream is frozen in tiny pumpkin shapes it carries out the pumpkin idea delightfully, but this is really not at all necessary.

Driven Apart

and hear the rest of what I have to tell you."

Beryl was like a person transformed. Her lovely face was aglow, her eyes were like stars, and she was trembling in an ecstasy of suddenly awakened hope.

"You have given Mr. Berdyne reason to hope that you would yield to his entreaties and consent to marry him," continued Irma Lee. "If you still love Neil Preston, to do such a thing even out of pity and gratitude would be to wrong both him and yourself; aye, and Berdyne and me. Mr. Preston, at this very moment, is on his way to Sunset Ranch——"

"Neil—coming here?" murmured Beryl, scarcely believing her ears.

"Yes."

"But he does not know where I am!"

"He does know, for I met him in San Francisco last evening and told him. Berdyne, as I have already informed you, is also coming. You must settle this matter with him, once and for all, before the man you love appears on the scene."

Beryl, blinded by the happy tears that suffused her eyes, sank to her knees. Often, in the bitterness of despair, her heart had rebelled against the cruel fate which seemed to have taken her darling from her; now, at last, she was brought to know how unnecessary had been her sorrow, how unjust her repining.

"You have suffered," said Irma Lee, bending over her, "needlessly suffered, and all because of the machinations of Nicholas Berdyne. Do not forget this in your coming interview with him; and do not fail, at that time, to conceal the source of your information. If you desire proof of what I have told you concerning Mr. Preston, you will find it in this paper."

Simultaneously with the last words a folded newspaper was pressed into Beryl's hand; and when her sight cleared, she saw that Irma Lee had vanished as suddenly as she had come. The paper proved to be a San Francisco daily. On the first page was a marked article containing an account of the recent arrival from Skaguay, Alaska of the steamer Argonaut. Among the list of returning passengers was the name of Neil Preston!

CHAPTER IV.

THE RETURN.

"Beryl! My little sweetheart!"

It was Berdyne's voice. He was mounting the veranda steps, his face aglow with eagerness, his hands outstretched toward Beryl, who had just risen from the hammock. The girl had expected him the evening before, but he had arrived late. He, and a man who had come with him, had had a midnight supper with Mr. Jackman. All three had retired in the wee small hours.

Beryl, through the open windows of her room on the second floor, had heard the voices of the three in low conversation. Mr. Berdyne had been at the ranch several times since Beryl had been the guest of the ranchman and his wife: and Beryl had imagined that these visits measured the length of Berdyne's acquaintance with Mr. Jackman. She was a little surprised, therefore, at the prolonged talk which the three men had had in the dining-room.

Mr. and Mrs. Jackman and Beryl, served by the Chinese cook had had their breakfast long before Mr. Berdyne and his companion were astir. Following the meal, Beryl had been waiting and nerving herself for the interview which she knew could not be much longer postponed. Now it was at hand, and it found her ready.

"Wait, Mr. Berdyne," said Beryl fluttering her hand with a restraining gesture.

Clad in a simple white gown, with a pale rose at her breast, Beryl had never looked more entrancingly lovely than she did at that moment. Her beauty was a lure to the man, beckoning him on even as her imperious manner repelled him.

Berdyne was abashed and bewildered. He stood for a time as her words had left him, one foot on the edge of the veranda, and the other on the step below.

"Why," he returned, "what do you mean, Beryl? What sort of greeting is this for your affianced husband?"

"Not that!" she cried vehemently.

"But you promised me—"

"I promised you nothing, Mr. Berdyne. Search your memory, and you will not find that, by word or deed have I ever given you the least encouragement."

Berdyne was like one stunned. Suddenly he dismissed his wonder with a shrug, mounted the last step, and seated himself on the veranda rail.

"By jove!" he muttered. "What sort of a tangent have you gone off on now, Miss Grayson? Will you go so far as to say there was no understanding between us? In pursuance of that understanding I have come from Denver to make you my wife. Your treatment of me, I must say, is decidedly cool. What has happened? If I read the signs aright, some one has been setting you against me."

"There was no understanding, Mr. Berdyne," persisted Beryl, quite calmly, "but I think it is high time we had one now."

"I grant you that, my dear," said he easily.

A flush of hot indignation swept through her rounded cheeks.

"Those terms of affection," she said, "are out of place—even were you the loyal friend of my father which you have led me to believe. I cannot listen to any more of them."

He gave a low whistle, and settled back against the veranda post. His narrowing eyes were filled with a bold, gloating insolence that aroused her loathing. She wondered, then, why she had needed those words of Irma Lee's to show her the true nature of this man. Ah, she had been blind, blind!

"I was grateful to you, Mr. Berdyne," Beryl went on, "for what I supposed was kindness extended to me on m father's account. You took for granted very much more than you had any warrant to do. You knew, at the time Mr. Preston went to Alaska, that—that I was engaged to him; and I have told you again and again that all my heart is his."

"Neil Preston has passed from the scene," said he. "I saw an account of his demise in a Skaguay paper, and the man Gorsline verified it."

"The man Gorsline," she said, drawing herself to her full height, "did not tell the truth. I believe, Mr. Berdyne, that he never went to Alaska at all, and that he brought me that wretched story at your instigation."

A muttered anathema fell from Berdyne's lips. Another moment and he had sprung to his feet.

"Who says that?" he roughly demanded. "Who has been talking to you?"

"That is beside the question." Beryl's nerves were tingling with excitement, but her resolution did not waver. She pointed to a newspaper lying in the hammock. "That paper," she continued, "gives an account of the arrival at San Francisco of the steamer Argonaut, and Neil's name is among the list of returning passengers."

He breathed a malediction under his breath.

"The time has come, Mr. Berdyne, when we must be perfectly frank with each other. I cannot be your wife. If I never stated this before as emphatically as I should have done, it was because I thought you had been good to me, and I hesitated to wound your feelings."

At that, his anger got the better of him.

"By Heaven," he cried fiercely, "you shall marry me! I am not the man to be trifled with by a chit of a girl. I love you; you are the one woman in all the world I want for my own. No power can take you from me!"

More and more was Berdyne revealing the nature which he had up to then kept studiously in the background. Beryl was horrified at the hideous treachery his words suggested.

"When I was ill in Denver," she continued, in a low tone, "just after the man Gorsline had come to me with his terrible falsehood, you had me removed from the miserable place where abject poverty had forced me to live, secured the best medical attention, and had a trained nurse come to take care of me. You did this, you said, because you and my father had been like brothers, and you could not bear to see Leroy Grayson's daughter sick and in want."

He laughed, and it was a laugh that gave the lie to his former pretensions.

"When I grew well enough to return to work," she resumed, "you would not listen to my returning to the grinding toil of the book bindery, with its mere pittance of wages, but sought to persuade me to live for a few weeks on your bounty. This I would not do, and I thank Heaven from the bottom of my heart that I was strong enough not to let myself be beguiled. Then you secured me a place as cloak model in the great establishment of Stein & Fetterman. At that time I believed you ever thoughtful, ever kind; and it was simply the fear of what people might think that led me to leave Denver and come to Sunset Ranch when Mr. Jackman offered me a home. You were doing too much for me, and I felt that I could not wound you by telling you so."

"You fancied that by coming here you could get away from me, eh?" The words were a taunt, and half concealed a sneer.

"I fancied that your generosity was carrying you into deep waters," she answered, resting one little hand over her wildly beating heart, "and I had hoped that when I came to Sunset Ranch you would understand my position and be generous enough to respect it."

"I was not to be shaken off so easily," said he, with a triumphant leer. "I have loved you, my little beauty, from the moment I first saw you running that stitching machine in the bindery; and I vowed then that, in spite of fate, you should one day be mine. Nor have I spent so much time and money on you merely to be turned aside by your sudden caprice."

"Am I to understand, then, that what you did was less for my father's sake than for the purpose of forwarding your own base designs?"

"You are to understand what you please," he brutally replied, "providing you do not overlook the fact that you are in my power, and that I am here to make you my wife!"

He took a step toward her, and she retreated before him.

"I am not in your power!" she cried. "I have but to raise my voice and Mr. Jackman will come to my aid. Do not touch me! Do not dare lay your hands upon me! Oh, I know what you are now, and I shall not rest until you have been paid back every penny you have spent upon me!"

Berdyne, his dark face full of passion, advanced rapidly toward her. She evaded him with a quick movement, and called loudly for Mr. Jackman.

"You may call till you are hoarse, my pretty termagant," said Berdyne mockingly, "but little good it will do you. I shall take you in my arms and snatch my first tribute from your red lips,"

A second more and the scoundrel might have accomplished his purpose; but there came a cry of anger, a stalwart form darted around the corner, leaped up the veranda steps, caught Berdyne by the shoulders, and flung him at full length on the boards.

"Beryl, my darling!"

She stared, her eyes wide with joy and stunned surprise, her small hands fluttering about her throat.

"Neil," she whispered, sinking into the outstretched arms that were waiting for her, "at last, at last!"

It was indeed Neil Preston, fortunately come at the very moment Beryl needed him most. Supporting his sweetheart with one arm, Neil shook a clenched fist over the scowling face of Berdyne.

"You scoundrel," he cried; "unless you wish further punishment, begone! I have returned from the North in time to foil your villainous plans, but have a care lest you tempt me too far. Out of my sight, you cur!"

Berdyne picked himself up slowly, and backed down the steps of the porch. His face was fairly livid with rage and hate.

"When I mark out my trail, Neil Preston," said he fiercely, "I follow it to the bitter end! For the moment, luck is with you; but my opportunity will come!"

"Go!" ordered Neil Preston, and Nicholas Berdyne turned on his heel and hastily strode away.

CHAPTER V.

THE PLOTTERS.

Berdyne, in spite of his despicable private character, was no coward; but he was at all times a man of discretion. He had not retaliated upon Neil Preston with force, choosing rather to bide his time and gain his revenge in another and more terrible way.

"My plans have gone awry," he muttered, in a fury of baffled hate, "just when they seemed near to consummation. I feared Preston would come, for I saw the notice about his arrival on the Argonaut before I left San Francisco. I have been precipitate, and queered everything! But I am not beaten yet. I will have the girl in spite of Preston, if I have to tear her from his arms at the very altar!"

While thus communing with himself, Berdyne's rapid pace carried him beyond the house, and into the tree-lined road that led downward into the valley and off toward San Jose. Here he encountered Hartley Trenwyck.

"What has gone wrong, Berdyne?" asked Trenwyck. "Your face is like a thundercloud."

"Everything has gone wrong!" growled Berdyne. "While I was talking with the girl, Preston showed up. He is with her now," he added, with a savage backward glance, "on the veranda at the other side of the house."

"By Jove!" muttered Trenwyck, with a worried look. "He'll have the girl now, in spite of you!"

Berdyne turned such a look of furious determination on the lawyer that he shivered, and would have given much to recall his words.

"I tell you again," said Berdyne, "that I have set my heart on the girl. Just now Preston seems to hold the trump card; but—mark my words, Trenwyck—my time will come! I shall make that proud beauty crawl on her knees before me, and Preston himself shall live to curse the day he ever crossed my path!"

There followed a brief silence.

"Your persistence, Nick," said the lawyer, finally, "is what I have always admired about you. I have something at stake in this affair no less than yourself, as you know very well. The day Beryl Grayson becomes your wife, Neil Preston's brother tenders me a check for five thousand dollars."

"I well understand to what I am indebted for your aid, Trenwyck," was Berdyne's sarcastic comment. "Morley Preston and his aristocratic parents have cut off Neil's allowance, and have threatened to disinherit him if he persists in his avowed purpose of marrying a working girl."

"Exactly," said the lawyer, with a snakelike smile. "None of the Denver Prestons believed for a moment that Neil was dead; they rather thought, I believe, that Neil spread the report himself in order to throw dust in their eyes. "But," and here Trenwyck's voice sank into an earnest, confidential tone, "leaving that honorarium of five thousand entirely out of the question, you could have counted upon my aid just the same. I owe you too much, Berdyne, not to put my shoulder to the wheel and help your case along."

"In order to make you more zealous in my cause," said Berdyne, "I will match Morley Preston's offer, and hand you another five thousand the moment Beryl Grayson is in my power."

"That is liberal, certainly," murmured Trenwyck. He was the lesser villain of the two mainly because he had not the means for extensive operations. "The question just now is: What are you going to do?"

Berdyne's tumultuous feelings were gradually settling down and his acute mind becoming more active. Silently he tendered the lawyer a cigar, and lighted one himself. After smoking for a few moments, he observed:

"The girl has unlimited trust in Jackman, the owner of the ranch here."

"She is the sort of person to make friends," commented Trenwyck, "and she has been here for some time."

"As it happens," pursued Berdyne, "I hold a heavy mortgage on this estate; it is now long overdue, and Jackman is virtually under my thumb."

Trenwyck gave a start, and his crafty eyes narrowed with comprehension.

"Then the letter Jackman wrote the girl, offering her a home at Sunset Ranch was inspired by you?"

"That's the way of it, Trenwyck. Jackman never knew the girl's father."

"By Jove, but you're a sly one!" muttered Trenwyck, with a look of open admiration. "And the girl is unaware of this?"

"She is entirely in the dark. If we can strive to heighten still further the girl's confidence by having Jackman order me away because of what took place here this morning, perhaps Beryl will continue to remain here for some little time."

"But Preston may remain, too."

"I think not. He will come back again, of course, with the intention of taking Beryl away with him; and during his absence, and while Beryl is still at the ranch house, we must contrive to encompass our designs."

"I see, I see," mused Trenwyck. "If you are ordered away, will you leave?"

"Certainly; I will leave, but you must stay to watch and give Jackman whatever assistance he needs."

"Where will you go?"

"To San Jose. My other motor car, the Red Flyer, will come down from San Francisco this afternoon. I had intended," he added, with a scowl, "to take my bride north in the car, but——" He suddenly broke off as his sinister face lighted up with a sudden idea. "I have it!" he exclaimed, striking his hands together exultantly.

"You have a plan?" queried Trenwyck, furtively.

"A happy thought, Trenwyck! Come, let us find Jackman."

They started off together, plotters of evil who would hesitate at nothing to gain their ends.

CHAPTER VI.

LOVE'S GOLDEN HOUR.

"Ah, dearest, the long, long months that have passed since I looked into your bonny eyes! It seems like an eternity. And for a whole year not one answer to the many letters that I sent, not one word from my little Princess Beryl! The suspense was almost more than I could bear; at times I feared that I should go mad."

Neil's dark-brown eyes were aflame with love; his handsome head, with its dark, curling hair, was bowed over the spun-gold tresses, and he clasped to his breast his sweetheart. Beryl was all atremble from sheer happiness as she turned her swimming eyes to his.

"My heart's idol!" she murmured. "The past seems like an evil dream; but again I am awake, and you are with me! You must never leave me again, darling, never! I could not bear to be parted from you again!"

"You shall not be!" he fondly answered. "I have tasted to the full the bitterness of separation, and I would rather die than go through it again."

"I wrote you often, dear," Beryl went on, nestling her head on his shoulder, "and how I waited and watched for some reply—but none came."

"My letters were intercepted," said Neil darkly. "Irma Lee told me of that when I saw her in San Francisco. As for your letters, they must have gone to the wrong address while I was lying in the hospital at Dawson City."

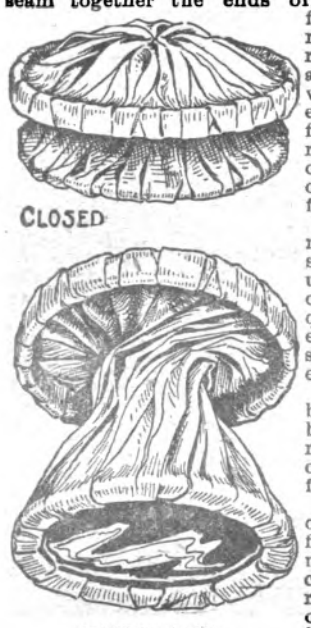
Attractive Gifts for the Christmas Cheer

"Sing, oh, sing! of the Christmas holly,
Bounteous cheer and all that's jolly;
Sing of the chimes and the falling snow,
And sing, oh, sing, of the mistletoe!"



CHRISTMAS again and as each day draws nearer, we of the COMFORT circle who delight in fashioning dainty and useful gifts must once again make our plans and begin to get busy.

For those who like to crochet we are including in our collection this month a beautiful Butterfly yoke pattern which was awarded a special prize. This would certainly be a welcome addition to any woman's wardrobe and especially to one who is filling a hope chest.

Vanity Case

This collapsible little case which can be made of a half yard of ribbon on a small piece of pretty silk is most complete as a toilet accessory when partly filled with powder and a small puff, as the bottom is a tiny mirror.

This and a small wooden hoop the size of the mirror are necessary. To make the bag French seam together the ends of three-inch soft finished satin ribbon. Put in a running thread along both selvages. On the edge which is to fit over the mirror, run in a second thread about one half inch from the edge.

VANITY CASE.

To fasten to mirror, draw up selvage thread until one has a circle from one quarter to three-eighths of an inch smaller than the edge of the glass.

Place this ribbon edge on the back of the mirror tie thread securely arranging fullness evenly.

Draw up second thread and fit over face of mirror fasten securely, then turn ribbon up and over edge. See illustration.

Sew the other edge over the wooden hoop. To close twist and the hoop will rest on edge of the mirror.

Doll's Trunk

Every little girl who enjoys dolls, is sure to be pleased with furniture of any sort for her dolly.

A home manufactured article which can be easily made of pasteboard is a little trunk.

This can be of any size, but before actually cutting the pasteboard or material for covering it will be best to experiment a little and make a satisfactory paper pattern.

Our diagram will give one an idea of the correct shape of the body and also a tray, if one wishes to include it.

The small piece with one curved side shows shape of end pieces of the trunk cover. After cutting all parts of pasteboard, plan the outside covering and lining. If the trunk is small, paste can be used largely in covering, but otherwise all edges should be turned in and the edges overcast together. Then the corners of the trunk overcast together with strong linen or cotton thread.

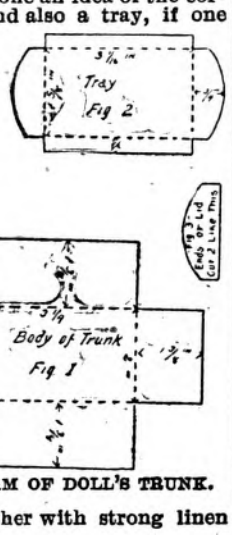


DIAGRAM OF DOLL'S TRUNK.

Suggestions for Making Christmas Gifts

A girl who was making a Christmas waist for a friend but was not able to finish it in time, sent a card on which was a sample of the cloth, and the message: GARMENT WILL FOLLOW.

With a laundry bag for baby's wee things send a card on which is:

"For baby's little duds
Before they go into the suds"

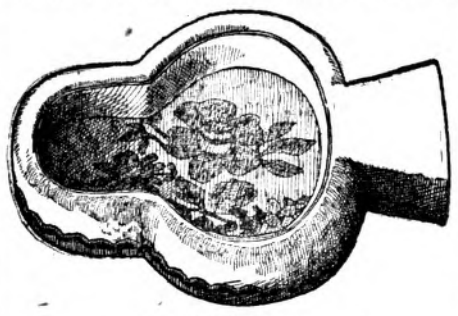
If you give cigars, do not buy them, but twist up a bill and put it through a cigar band, then let the man select the brand he likes.

An apron may have a bill pinned in the pocket, and the kindly wish expressed on a card:

May your pocket never be empty.

With a darning bag:
Heigh ho! a hole in the toe,
How I do wish that stockings would grow;
A cotton sock vine, or a stocking tree
What a refreshing sight 'twould be.

And with a work basket, Henry Ward Beecher's saying:



"Industry can do anything which genius can do, and very many things which it cannot."

The Suspended Basket

Suspend from a good strong chandelier a fancy basket of sufficient size to hold the gifts, and tilt it sharply. To each gift tie a long ribbon, to the loose end of which the name card of the recipient should be attached. Place gifts in basket slightly tangling the ribbons so they will not separate too easily. At a given signal all take hold of the extreme end of the ribbon and pull gently thus causing the entire basketful to come tumbling to the table beneath the chandelier.

Much fun will be caused by the untangling of the ribbons and the showing of gifts when they are separated.

Appropriate jingles always add to the fun, as the reading of each creates much merriment.

A JEWEL TRAY.

A Jewel Tray

This little tray which is designed for one's bureau or dressing table, has a corrugated pasteboard foundation, bound together with adhesive tape, or the different parts can be sewed together.

A very attractive little gift can be made in this way by using odd bits of silk or velvet for covering. The tray shown is of plush decorated on the bottom with a spray of roses in oil colors. The lower outside edge is bound with a dull gold braid.

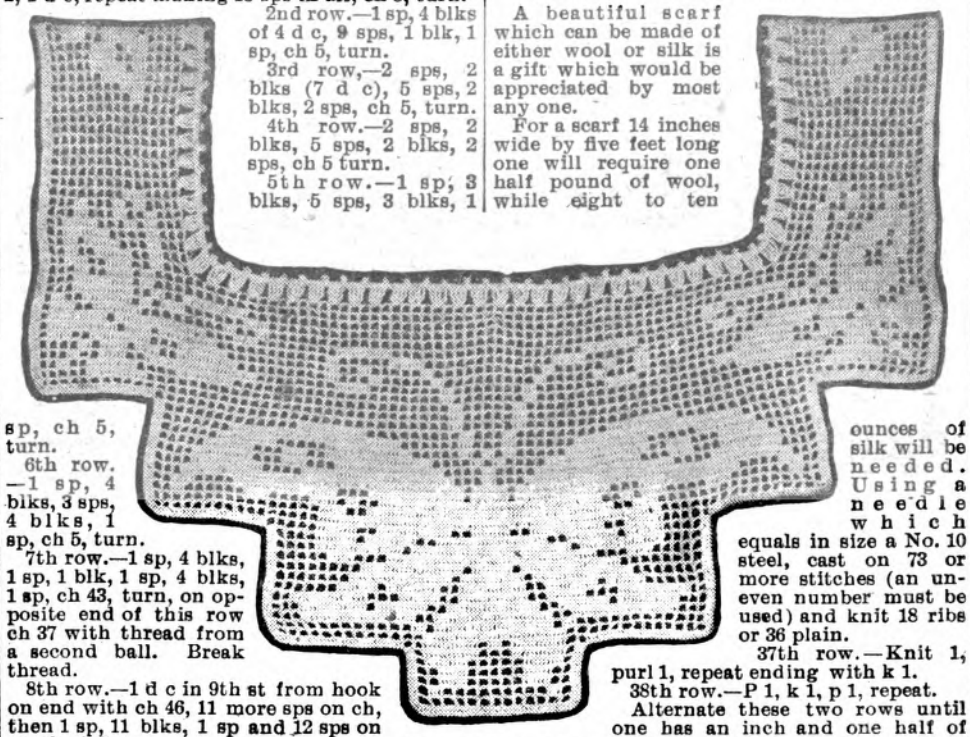
10th row.—3 sps, 9 blks, 2 sps, 9 blks, 2 sps, 9 blks, 3 sps, ch 5, turn.

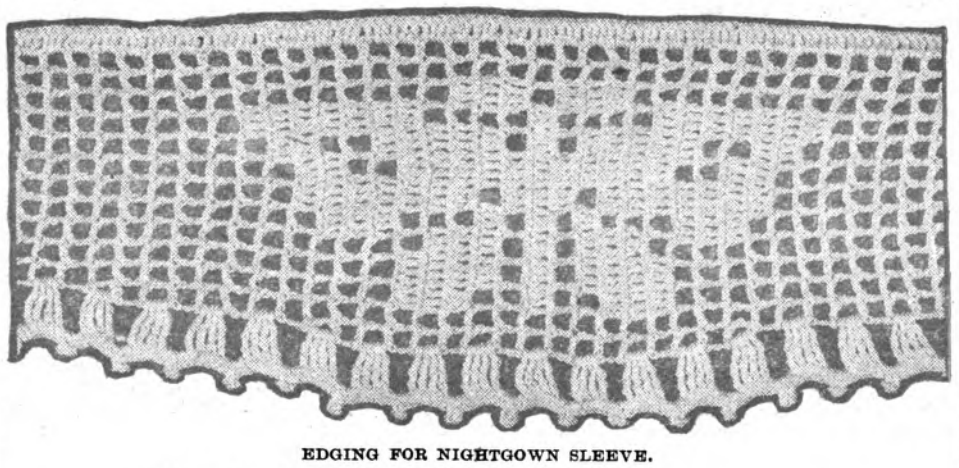
11th row.—3 sps, 5 blks, 1 sp, 4 blks, 2 sps, 7 blks, 2 sps, 4 blks, 1 sp, 5 blks, 3 sps, ch 5, turn.

12th row.—2 sps, 6 blks, 3 sps, 3 blks, 2 sps, 5 blks, 2 sps, 3 blks, 3 sps, 6 blks, 2 sps.



13th row.—6 sps, 3 blks, 1 sp, 4 blks, 2 sps, 5 blks, 2 sps, 4 blks, 1 sp, 3 blks, 6 sps.

14th row.—7 sps, 8 blks, 1 sp, 5 blks, 1 sp, 8 blks, 7 sps.



15th row.—8 sps, 8 blks, 1 sp, 3 blks, 1 sp, 8 blks, 8 sps, ch 5, turn.

One works four more rows on this width and then enlarges again as shown in our illustration for which a complete working chart can be obtained. After completeing the front complete the strap over each shoulder working the same small butterfly which appears in the center of the edging for the sleeves on each shoulder.

For back work a strip 14 sps wide and 55 rows long join to the shoulder straps on either side, afterwards making one row of double crochet all around the lower edge of the yoke working two doubles in each sp and one double on each double or in the end of the row. In corner sps 7 doubles.

NIGHTGOWN YOKE WITH BUTTERFLY DESIGN IN FILET CROCHET.

EDGING FOR NIGHTGOWN SLEEVE.

Edging for Neck

Shell of four d, tr c in every other sp all around finishing with 1 s c in each st with picot over each shell.

Edging for sleeves is made as shown, and finished with this same shell.

Embroidered Stockings

Hand-embroidered stockings are expensive, but not beyond the reach of the girls with nimble fingers. As gifts they are sure of a welcome, for a girl who does not love fine hosiery is indeed rare.

At present clocks are all the fad. These can be of self color, or black or white as preferred.

The work should begin at the ankle two and one-half inches from the center back of the seam, and run in a vertical for six and one-half inches, following the warp of the stocking, which will carry the clocks straight and further from the seam at the top, than at the ankle.

The work should be in satin stitch, which is simply an over and over stitch worked very closely together. At the ankle the main line of the clock should separate into two lighter lines which can either be of satin or seed stitch. The shorter one to the back follows the heel section keeping parallel with the vertical threads. The longer line runs parallel with and one such from the sole section.

The work can be accomplished more easily if the stocking is held in a very small embroidery hoop. The seed stitch consists of two tiny stitches, one upon the other, to give a raised effect.

Maline Evening Cap

For evening wear, instead of a scarf, young people enjoy a dainty cap which cannot fail to add to one's attractiveness if made up in a becoming shade. A half yard of waterproof maline and one and one quarter yards of inch-wide velvet ribbon, will be needed.

These ingenious little contrivances are very useful to keep one's hair from blowing about, and are most simple in construction.

Gather the edges of the maline and sew to the ribbon leaving about a six-inch space to be tucked in when the ribbon is tied around the head.

Knitted Apple-seed Stitch Scarf

A beautiful scarf which can be made of either wool or silk is a gift which would be appreciated by most any one.

For a scarf 14 inches wide by five feet long one will require one half pound of wool, while eight to ten ounces of silk will be needed. Using a needle which equals in size a No. 10 steel, cast on 73 or more stitches (an uneven number must be used) and knit 18 ribs or 36 plain.

37th row.—Knit 1, purl 1, repeat ending with k 1.

38th row.—P 1, k 1, p 1, repeat.

Alternate these two rows until one has an inch and one half of apple-seed stitch. Follow with 9 ribs plain knitting. Then apple-seed stitch until scarf is length desired allowing for bordering the other end in the same way.

Knit of black and white silk one has a most dressy and attractive scarf. For every-day wear one of blue and green mixed wool would satisfy the most fastidious taste.

Crochet Boudoir Cap

For an easily made cap of any two shades preferred, begin with ch 10 join in ring.

1st round.—Ch 5, 29 tr c in ring, join, ch 5.

2nd round.—5 trs, over trs * ch 5, 5 trs, repeat making 6 clusters in all, ch 5, join to first ch, ch 5.

3rd round.—2 tr c, * ch 5, 1 tr c under ch 5, ch 5, 3 tr c, repeat from * ending with two ch 5, join to first cluster ch 13.

4th round.—1 tr c under ch 5, ch 8, 1 tr c under ch 5, ch 8, 1 tr c over 3 trs, repeat around joining last ch to ch 13, slip st over 3 sts.

5th round.—* ch 5, 1 p, ch 5, 1 p, ch 12, slip st in 10th ch to form ring, 15 s c, in ring, 1 picot ch, slip st under ch 8, repeat from * all around joining last picot ch, to first ch, slip st back of picot first ch and up to top of ring.

6th round.—* 1 picot ch, ch 12 form ring, 15 s c in ring, 1 picot ch, slip st in top of ring in last round, repeat from * all around, join as in last round and slip st to top of ring.

7th round.—* ch 15, 1 s c in top of next ring, repeat from *.

8th round.—19 s c under each ch 15 join thread and break.

9th round.—Starting with second color, * make two picot chs, slip st in 8th s c, repeat all around.

10th, 11th, 12th and 13th rounds.—Same as 9th round.

14th round.—Same as 5th round.

15th round.—Same as 6th round.

16th round.—Same as 7th round.

17th round.—Same as 8th round. Join thread and break.

18th round.—With first color used copy design from ninth round. With second color make three rows of double knot stitch.

A Novel Needlecase

An original idea for a needlecase is next shown. This tiny parasol is of two, three and one-half inch circles of silk, edge with an inch frill of white lace.

In the exact center of the silk punch a small hole and around it. Through ivory crochet hook, parasol handle. The even distances edge, with their center. These form points on the edge buttonholed bars under which a narrow ribbon is run for drawing up and tying when the case is not in use.

Collar Protector

Any particular person will appreciate and enjoy this becoming and useful little scarf.

It is made of one yard of fine white blond or washable net and can be finished as shown with white crocheted roses or a tassel.

To make, fold the net lengthwise and seam up, turn inside out, gather the ends and finish as suggested.

Crocheted Roses

Using No. 80 cotton and fine hook ch 6, join.

1st round.—12 s c in ring.

2nd round.—Ch 6, skip 1 s c, 1 d c, ch 3, skip 1 s c, 1 d c in next, repeat until there are 6 spaces joining last ch 3 to 3rd st of ch 6.

3rd round.—Under each ch 3 make 1 s c, 5 d c, 1 s c.

4th round.—Ch 5, fasten between petals, repeat around.

5th round.—Under each ch 5, make 1 s c, 8 d c, 1 s c.

6th round.—Same as 4th only making chs 7.

7th round.—Same as 5th, 1 s c, 9 d c, 1 s c under chains.

The fringe is made of chains of varying lengths with groups of 5 doubles worked in here and there.

A Home-Made Handkerchief

Use a square of fine linen, lawn or even fine checked dimity and edge it by crocheting all around with a very fine mercerized thread of either white or colors.

To insure the handkerchief being true, threads should be drawn before the squares are cut, and then at least one thread should be drawn about three-eighths of an inch in from the edge, roll the edges and work over them, crocheting into the drawn space. This will give an even line to the stitches and also an appearance of hem-stitching.

COLLAR PROTECTOR.

The work should be done with a fine steel crochet hook and the stitches taken close together.

Begin working on a corner, make 1 single crochet, ch 3 for picot, 1 single crochet, 1 picot, measure work to next corner and fold until spaces are about one-half inch, then crease. Over each of these creases make 1 picot, on each corner 3 picots with a s c between each, finishing the last corner with 1 picot.

An initial in cross-stitch or a small wreath in lazy-daisy stitch can be added if desired.

Notice

As space does not allow of our giving complete directions for the Butterfly Nightgown Yoke, a working chart, showing the pattern full size, and which will show design in detail, has been prepared and will be promptly mailed upon receipt of 10 cents. COMFORT Fancy Work Department, Augusta, Maine.

Original Designs in Filet Crocheting

A Comfort Case

VERY attractive little cases can be made of bits of bright ribbon or silk. The one shown is of a particularly good shape, made up of figured and plain materials and bound with a narrow ribbon.

On the inside is a pocket fitted with small lengths of different shades of silk, black and white cotton, a few hooks, eyes and snaps; opposite this are leaves of pinked flannel filled with pins, needles and safety pins. With such a case as this one is well equipped to meet most any accident to their wearing apparel.

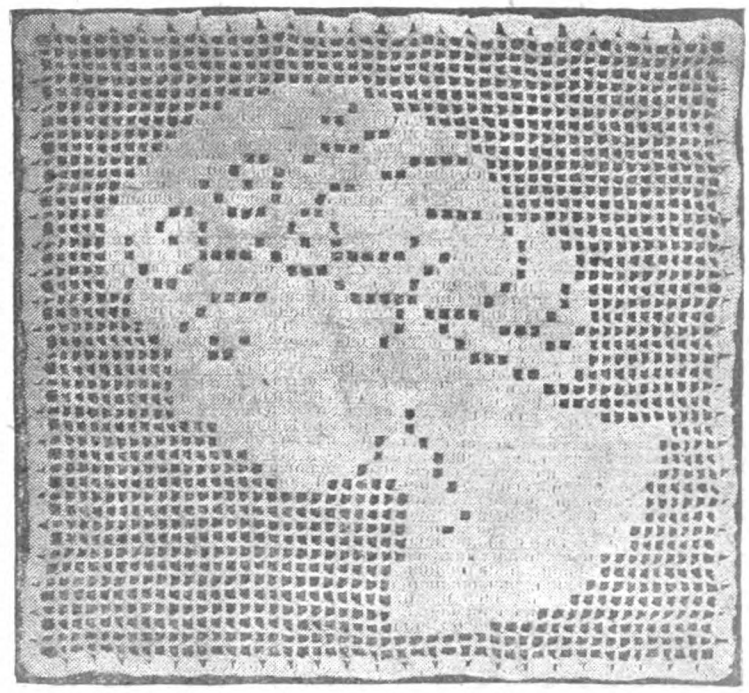
Drawnwork Handkerchief

BY LAURA L. MILLER.

This effective pattern can be used quite as well on coarser linen for scarfs, centerpieces etc. For a handkerchief take a 12-inch square of fine linen, leave one inch for hem, draw three-fourths of an inch, buttonholing the corners neatly. Knot the thread into strands of six threads on both sides of drawn space. Knot the strands in groups of four each. Knot each of the four strands one-eighth inch from edge, pass up across space to one-eighth inch above center of next group and knot across then down, knot 3rd like 1st knot two threads above this, the 3rd one-eighth in above 1st. Weave back and forth on these threads from 1st to 2nd groups, then weave back and forth on fourth strands of second group below center one-eighth inch, then on two one-sixteenth inch put needle down through woven work back to center. Fill corner in same way starting in center, where threads are knotted together weave around a few times to make the center then on four threads to make each of the four petals of the flower.



HANDKERCHIEF WITH BORDER IN DRAWNWORK.

A Friend of the Bachelor Man or Maid

Cut out this figure, and using it as a pattern, cut sixteen pieces from used postcards. Lay two of these pieces together back to back, and buttonhole stitch all around with silkateen. There will be eight of these. Overhand two together on two sides, catching through the buttonholing only. There will be a point sticking out, join another to one of these, and so on until there are six in the row, then join the ends. This makes the sides of the box. Overhand the bottom in place. Fasten the cover on one edge only and make a little loop on the front edge to lift it by. Cover a little wad of wool batting with silk, and glue it to the top for a needle cushion. Take a yard of narrow ribbon and cut it into six equal pieces. Fold each piece so one end is twice as long as the other. Sew on this fold to one of the points on the side of the box. String a spool on the long end and tie in a bow to the short end on the next point. Have four spools of darning cotton—black, white, brown and gray and two of button thread—black—black and white. The inside is for buttons, thimble and scissors.

Many pretty color combinations may be made. The box illustrated is made of Christmas cards with red trimmings. Mrs. J. B. Silliman.

Imitation Stained Glass Plaques

Handsome little gifts can be made of colored tissues very easily. These are imitation colored glass plaques to hang in windows.

The first step in making one is to join a good-sized black hat wire to form a circle seven or nine inches in diameter. Over this stretch a piece of white lawn.

Select a picture one would like to copy, place the lawn over it and with a pencil draw in the sky line, clouds, trees, fences, a stream or other objects. Complexed scenes, however, are not effective and should be avoided.

After making the tracings of the various parts, cut the sky clouds, trees and other objects from paper of the right color. Finally paste the various parts in their proper places on the background, covering both sides.

LAWN TEA APRON.

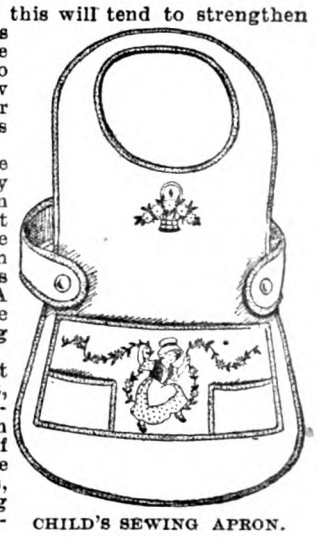
As little paste as possible should be used and several thicknesses of tissue will be needed to give the desired color. When the different parts are all in place, each side should be covered with transparent waxed paper.

Then cover the joinings of the various parts with cords of tinseled black crepe paper to represent the leads used to hold the pieces of glass together.

Finish the edge with several rounds of the black, after which put the whole under a weight until thoroughly dry and set.

Squares and oblongs can also be made, and if the work is neat, most effective transparencies will result from this method.

Useful Aprons



An apron of some sort is apt to be first choice with numberless people when wishing to choose a useful gift. The small one which we illustrate, while not a new idea in any way, is both practical and dainty.

As shown it is made up of lawn with fine Hamburg ruffle and pocket.

Child's Sewing Apron

Such a gift as this will tend to strengthen any little maid's ambition and be an incentive to learn how to sew and embroider and make one's clothes.

The shape of the apron is clearly shown, its length in the front should come about to the hem of the child's dress skirt. A belt crosses the back, buttoning on either side.

CHILD'S SEWING APRON.

Across the front is a large pocket, prettily decorated, and in either corner of this pocket are two smaller ones, thus providing space for needle-book, thread, scissors, while the larger pocket holds one's work and all working materials.

White linen shoestrings are one and one half inches wide, with tiny machine hemmed edges and hemstitched ends.

Fortunes Founded Through Luck

HENRY POMEROY DAVISON.

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

A BOY of coolness and courage who also is honest and loyal to his employer is sure to get on in the world—is bound to rise. Such a boy was Harry Davison of Troy, Pa., now the head of the American National Red Cross and a partner in the great banking house of J. P. Morgan & Co.

Once the village schoolmaster in his native place, after two years he got tired of it, so his uncle gave him a chance in his bank. After he had been clerking in this small country financial institution for four years, came along his first streak of luck—an offer from a Bridgeport, Conn., bank.

The boy was wild with delight. "Uncle," he burst out, "the Pequannock Bank of Bridgeport wants me as a bookkeeper. It's my chance—and I'd like to go right away!"

But his wise old Uncle Eleazer was not quite so sanguine. "Remember, Harry," he warned, "'a rolling stone gathers no moss.' Now you've got a home and family here, a place in a bank that'll never turn you off—and you may be president if you stay on!"

All this made a deep impression on the embryo financier, and he pondered long and deeply, for he had the habit of caution. Nevertheless, the great world of Opportunity attracted him like a powerful magnet—he could not resist its call to broader duties and larger chances.

His services proved as satisfactory in Bridgeport as back home. He studied the job higher up, endeavoring to prepare himself for a step higher. Such good use did he make of his opportunities that in four years he was ready to take the position of paying-teller in the old Astor Place Bank. Here he followed the same plan of learning all he could about jobs higher up, and, in addition, he studied law at night, for he felt the need of a little legal knowledge.

Now came the crucial test of his ability, and the greatest piece of luck of his life. Looking up suddenly from some money he was counting one morning, his hair almost stood on end as he glanced along the shining barrel of a six-shooter poking its nose through his grille! And behind the weapon he encountered the maniacal glare of two burning eyes. The madman thrust a check at him, and it read:

"Pay one thousand dollars to the order of Almighty God."

Davison always had his wits about him. He was clear-headed and a quick thinker. He sized the matter up correctly and instantaneously.

"You'll have to be identified," he shouted in unusually loud tones; "haven't you a friend in the bank?"

The bank detective heard the young teller, and coming noiselessly behind the crank seized him and he was soon in Bellevue Hospital.

The story of the teller's presence of mind and nerve spread like wildfire in banking circles, and it was not long before Davison was called higher up. In 1894 he was asked to become assistant cashier at the Liberty National. Soon he was cashier, then vice-president and finally president. Then, in 1902, he was elected vice-president of the First National Bank, one of the biggest financial institutions in the world.

This seemed to be the "top of the tree," but he did better still, becoming a member of the Morgan firm.

Mr. Davison has now been in the banking business more than a quarter of a century, and his field of study these days is the world—Europe, South America and China. Once he had to consider loans of one hundred or one thousand dollars. Now he handles loans far up in the millions—even billions!

The boy Henry Davison was not asleep when luck came his way. Not only was he wide awake, but he had gumption enough to make the most of his lucky chances—to seize them quickly.

Today Henry Pomeroy Davison (Knight of the Order of the Crown of Italy) is one of the big guns in the house of Morgan, and known the world over as a great financier.

But if he had held on to his comfortable little job at home, or shown cowardice when the pistol was stuck in his face—what then?

strings with a red iron roof. I took the boards all off and put them on up and down, leaving openings for windows which I screened and had canvas flaps to raise up or shut down tight. I covered all this with canvas tacked on smooth and tight. I made the interior into a three-room bungalow, with a living-room seven by 12 feet and dining-room and kitchen each six by seven feet, with a built-in writing desk, bookcase and dressing table. I covered the walls with tan canvas and had rag carpets. My husband made a library table. It was rough and unstained but with a tan linen scarf it looked good. A wide shelf in the dining-room made a "buffet" for a few pieces of cut glass and china. I covered the walls with some calico I happened to have and made rag rugs for the floor. I had a built-in work table in the kitchen with shelves over it and under it and cabinet at end of stove. I covered the kitchen walls with oil cloth and made curtains from old lace ones. With bits of linen and a few balls of cotton I made doilies and buffet scarf for dining-room. A little flag of red, white and blue floated from my living-room window. People called it the Doll House, but it was pretty and comfortable and I worked hard to make it so. Then the mine closed but I left it far better than when I found it and that is not a bad mark to leave. And the comfort we got from it was greater than my work.

We bought a tiny cabin in the mountains and also an old house where we worked every night last fall until dark, wrecking it. We took the shingles off, one by one, to save them and the nails and with what help my husband can give me we are building this little cabin into a house of five rooms and bath with a fine large screened living porch with most of the furniture hand made and you would be surprised to see how convenient it is. It shows what one can do if they but try. If we can't have the things we like and which many of us are accustomed to, the only thing to do is make the best we can from what we have to do with. The less we have the harder we must work. The essential thing is "will." Give will freedom; a strong will is master of the body. The right will is lord of the mind's several faculties. The perfect will is high priest of the moral self. Where there is a will to do these things and a persisting energy you cannot help but gain but when your will fails the battle is lost.

If I can help anyone rebuild or improve their home I shall be glad to do it but give me a floor plan of your house, showing where doors and windows come so that I will have something upon which to work.

I hope I have said something that will help someone. What can be accomplished depends upon the person.

Wishing you all the very best in life,

Very truly yours, MRS. RAY DRAIN.

Mrs. Drain.—Your letter was the first response (and a generous one it was) to my query as to what the sisters had done, with little money, to make the home attractive. I don't understand it for I feel sure that is the aim and ambition of the majority of the sisters. Perhaps they are too busy to tell us about it and I can understand that side of it.—Ed.

PONCE DE LEON, FLA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I enjoy COMFORT and have gotten much help from it and now I come for more. A year ago I read a remedy for goitre in one of the sister's letters. It was white iodine. I have tried hard to get it but have failed. Will that sister or anyone who can help me, write to me. My goitre isn't large but I want to stop the growth.

I enjoy Nelle Fischer's letters. Have always wanted to travel but I guess I am rooted to this spot. But I have plenty to keep me busy as I have four children and a husband.

How many of the readers remember Oleta Littleheart who used to write for COMFORT? I have a little girl named for her, also one named Wenona. I do all my own work and have picked and canned nearly one hundred quarts of berries and made some jelly. I find time to go fishing once in a while, too.

Wishing all every success,

MRS. ANNIE STANDLEY.

MISSOURI

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for ten years and think it is the best paper ever published for the price.

I am a young mother, not quite twenty-three years of age, and my pathway of life hasn't been strewn with roses all along the way but now I have a good kind husband and two sweet children, a little girl of four and a boy of one. Only you who are mothers can understand my love for my little ones. How carefully we should watch over our darlings. We should, in their early years, teach their little lips to pray. I shall try and rear my children the way the Father in Heaven intends me to. I am truthful with them and never deceive them about anything. I do not teach them about Santa Claus because I do not think it is right. To me there is no greater mission on earth than to be a good mother, and we should always try to keep our children in good company if we want them to become noble men and women. Why is it that when a girl goes wrong nearly every other mother is unwilling to have her daughter associate with her in any way, though she may lead a good life afterwards, while the man who led her into sin is welcomed into their parlors and even made welcome as a member of the family. This is particularly true if he owns a car and a fat pocketbook. Oh, the short sightedness of people in the world today! God intended man to be just as pure and clean as He intended woman to be. My heart will ache as much in future years if I know that my boy is impure, as though it were my girl.

I want to comment upon a few subjects and the first one is how can mothers take the lives of their unborn babies? I certainly agree with Billy Sunday when he says that one doesn't have to go to the penitentiaries to find murderers. He says that women who take the lives of their unborn are murderesses and are as guilty of crime as those behind prison bars, and yet we see this going on around us all the time. I would not feel any more guilty to take the lives of my children now than to have murdered them unborn. Let us hear what more of the sisters have to say on the subject.

And I wonder how a woman can throw herself away. To me there is nothing so beautiful in the world as a pure, virtuous girl or woman, one whose name is unstained. Truly she is worth a price far above rubies. A man, no matter how low he may become in vice and wickedness, cannot fail to treat a pure woman with respect.

How can mothers expect their daughters to become noble women when they willingly let them dance in the wicked, shameful dance halls where they dance the indecent dances of today?

I have been a member of the Christian Church since I was fifteen years of age and I have tried to live up to and obey my Savior's teachings. True, I have made many mistakes but have had a few victories over sin and hope to have many more.

Evangeline Dobe, let us hear from you again.

I wonder why there is not more kindness shown in the world? It costs nothing and even a smile with a pleasant "Good Morning" serves as a balm to some aching heart that is starving for love. Let's give our roses to our loved ones now. If anyone has a flower for me I'd rather have it while I am alive than after I'm dead.

Closed eyes cannot see the bright roses,
Cold hands cannot hold them, you know.
Breath that is still cannot gather
The odors that sweet from them flow.
Death with a price beyond dreaming
Its children of earth doth endow;
Life is the time to help others,
Give them the roses now.

My heart is full of the deepest sympathy for all who come to our corner with their troubles. May they soon see brighter days, is my prayer.

If I haven't stayed too long this time I'll come again. May God bless you all.

A LOVER OF COMFORT.

WESTERNPORT, MD.

GOOD MORNING, DEAR SISTERS:

May I come in this bright morning? Isn't God good to give us life and this beautiful world in which to live?

Lonely, and others, when you feel like this:

"And my heart was hot and restless,
And my life was full of care,
And the burden laid upon me
Seemed greater than I could bear——" try singing this favorite hymn of mine:

"Ask what thou wilt, believing heart,
The answering time will come;
Pray and believe, that is thy part,
The answering time will come;
Though dark the way, still trust and pray,
The answering time will come."

Mrs. Metroe Andrews, I think the husband should try to hold his wife's affections; still, we are stronger to resist temptation, more able to bear physical pain and sorrow than they so let us pity them and always forgive and forget.

Prospect of Large Profits from Eggs and Poultry

I AM feeling so elated that I must pass along the good news. At a Farm Bureau meeting in Fairfield County, Connecticut, last month, a large grain dealer, who is, of course, in close touch with the general trend of affairs in the grain business, offered to bet a dairyman fifty to one that feed would be down to a dollar a bag by the end of the year. Is not that something to rejoice over? The home folks who have kept their small flocks going in spite of the high price of grain, are going to reap a rich reward this coming year. So many of the smaller commercial poultrymen went out of business during the war that the cold storage supply is extremely short, added to which, imports of eggs must necessarily be low, with Belgium and France in their present devastated condition. Just consider, during the three years before the war, we received from those countries 1,573,394 dozen of eggs. You can readily understand what an extra demand there will be on the home flocks, and why the market price is sure to keep up all over the country. In the vicinity of New York, Boston and Philadelphia, it has not dropped below 75 cents a dozen all through the summer, so even if grain prices don't drop, the farmers' hens must be the most profitable stock on the place this year, because the farmer hasn't got to buy everything his hens eat. There are always waste apples, vegetables, clover or alfalfa on the farm, and such by-products are fully one half the materials necessary to produce a good egg supply.

Many of our COMFORT subscribers have asked me about the origin and development of Rhode Island Reds. I have, after some trouble, succeeded in getting what I think is authentic information. Two men, John Macomber and William Tripp, of a small town in Massachusetts, which was called Westport about fifty years ago but which has been rechristened and is now known as Central Village, made a business of buying up fowl through the country for the New Bedford market, and as the supply was not always satisfactory, they determined to try breeding something better than the average bird they could pick up. They wanted a breed of good size and quick growth. They did a whole lot of crossing with all sorts of birds, without any regard for beauty, shape or plumage, for both men were busy, and only cared for market qualities, and probably it was just the fact that size and health was selected in all the ancestral matings that has made the breed so strong and vigorous. According to the data collected by the Agricultural Station at Kingston, Rhode Island, in 1900, Mr. Tripp was the one who eventually carried out the idea of establishing a new breed on strictly general purpose lines. Judging from several accounts given by neighbors, and Mr. Tripp's son and daughter, the original crosses made by Mr. Tripp and Mr. Macomber were between the old Red Shanghai and Cochin China birds, though at some subsequent time Malay and Brahma blood was introduced, and Mr. Tripp's son, in a letter written several years ago to the Agricultural Station, mentions the fact that one time his father tried introducing both Brahma and Wyandotte blood, but did not like the result nearly as well as the old breeds, and so dropped it, and built up a new flock by selecting the best hens from his own old matings, and the best cockerels from Mr. Macomber's stocks. Both of the gentlemen having passed away before any real investigation started, we have to depend on others for information.

A letter from Doctor Aldrich furnishes such explanatory history that I give it in full:

"In 1890 I could not obtain any history of the Rhode Island Reds outside of the territory bounded by the Seaconnet River, the Atlantic Ocean, the East Branch of Westport River, and the Massachusetts line. The great poultry farmers on the south shore,—Sisson, Tripp, Seabury, Manchester, Beebe, Brown, Wilbour, etc., all bred Rhode Island Reds in 1890, and fine flocks they were. At Miss Tripp's, north of the south shore (one mile from Levi Sisson's), I obtained the history of her flock that dated back forty years (now sixty-four years). She remembered her father bringing the red rooster home, and they have bred the fowls ever since. They were rose and single comb fowls—I should say more rose than single. At Tiverton Four Corners, in 1891, I obtained as fine a specimen of rose-combed Rhode Island red cock as I ever saw in my life; red to the skin, and today his blood is undoubtedly to be found in some of the best strains of Buff Wyandottes as well as in some good strains of Rhode Island Reds. The first Reds on the Island of Rhode Island were at Bateman's Point, Newport, from my eggs. Later they were found in the neighborhood of Portsmouth. In 1891 or 1892 I found practically no Rhode Island Reds on the Island, or east of Hick's Bridge, so-called, except one flock on the road to Horseneck. Between Westport River and New Bedford there were no Reds in the early nineties. Tolman's Reds (Bay View House, Tiverton) were raised from eggs obtained from Mr. Cottrell in 1892 or 1893. Mr. Cottrell's Reds were called Red Malays. They were all single comb (not a rose comb in the flock), and some of the best Buff Rock strains date back to these single comb Reds of Mr. Cottrell's. In the Tiverton country the Reds were not rose combs, but single, and were called Malays more often than they were called Rhode Island Reds. These Reds had no suggestion of Leghorn blood in them. The Rose Comb Rhode Island Reds now in Tiverton were obtained in Little Compton. At Westport (head of river) the Reds looked 'leghorny.' There was no doubt some rose comb Leghorn blood was in some of the flocks. At Central Village the Rhode Island Reds were both rose and single comb, and were bred in large numbers by Mr. Booth and Mr. Kirby (both of whom are now dead) and others between Central Village, Hick's Bridge and Westport Point. At Little Compton there were rose and single Rhode Island Reds. I have no doubt the rose comb came from the rose comb Shanghai cock rather than from any rose comb Leghorn or Wyandotte blood, although the Leghorn could occasionally be seen quite plainly. Very little Wyandotte blood could be found. Occasionally some White Wyandotte blood could be found, introduced from cockerels raised by Fred Bowen of Fall River, but the rose comb, I am sure, antedated any introduction of Wyandotte or Leghorn blood, that is, in the neighborhood of Little Compton."

A study has been made of the fowls of succeeding generations, and the endeavor has been to correct the standard to correspond as nearly as might be with the characteristics of the best specimens obtained in the process.

The Standard in use at the Rhode Island Experiment Station is herewith submitted, in response to numerous requests for the same from poultrymen interested in the advancement of this valuable variety of fowls:

Rhode Island Reds, Male

Weights: Cock, eight pounds; cockerels, seven pounds.

Comb: Pea, of medium size, having the appearance of three single combs joined together at the base, the center divison being straight from front to rear, evenly serrated into not less than five points, highest in the center, the side divisions slightly curved with not less than four serrations, and merging into the central division at front and rear; bright red in color.

Defects: Comb, when too large and inclined to one side, or having insufficient "channels" between divisions, or excessively large, cut one half to even two points according to degree. Combs other than pea, or so loose as to fall from side to side, refuse score card record.

Head: Medium in length, skull wide, the crown slightly overhanging the eyes. Face bright red, showing free of feathers well above the eyes; eyes bright bay. Ear lobes and wattles fine in texture, well developed, clearly defined and bright red in color. Beak stout at base and well curved to point, yellow or horn color shading to yellow, and may have a dark stripe down the upper mandible.

Defects: When depressed in front of eye, wattles too small and rudimentary, beak slightly turned to one side, cut one half to one and one half according to degree. When beaks are crossed or wattles absent in males, refuse score card.

Neck: Medium in length, nicely curved; hackle abundant and flowing well over the shoulders and cape. Color bright ferruginous, free from color other than as described.

Defects: Hackle too short, or failing to cover shoulder and cape; black appearing in a stripe, white in undercolor; cut one half to one and one half according to degree.

Back: Medium long, back proper mahogany bay in color, shading from back proper to a rich ferruginous saddle, hangers falling well down over the points of the wing bay.

Defects: Narrow or pinched in saddle; oval or roached back; white in undercolor or black in surface color; cut one half or one and one half according to degree. Pass as unworthy when the shell bone is crooked or one or both hips are slipped.

Breast: Full and round from shoulder to shoulder and from throat to keel bone, making the quarters prominent, color rich ferruginous red, shading into a lighter hue of the same shade in the undercolor.

Defects: Wedge shaped from quarters to keel; white in undercolor; surface too light in shade; cut one half to one point for each.

Body and Fluff: Keel bone straight; well supplied with muscles from front to rear, color same as that of breast, shading lighter to the fluff.

Defects: Crooked keel; keel muscles shrunken; drab color in the surface or white in the undercolor; cut one half to one and one half according to degree.

Wings: Medium in size, with points well covered with saddle hangers. Color of wingbow, mahogany bay; of coverts, rich ferruginous, forming wing bar; of primaries, black and rich ferruginous, black predominating; lower edge of lower web laced with rich ferruginous; of secondaries, lower portion of lower web rich ferruginous sufficient to create wing-bay of this shade, the same color going about the point of the feather, lacing the upper portion of the upper web, this upper lacing growing wider as the secondaries upwards, the five feathers between secondaries proper and back taking on a surface color to match that of back and cape.

Defects: Loosely folded primaries; twisted feathers in primaries or secondaries; white or gray appearing in any part; cut one half to one and one half according to degree. Pass as unworthy twenty per cent of white or gray, or primaries folded outside of secondaries.

Tail: Carried tolerably upright, spread laterally, extended at an angle as seen in the capital letter A, not too closely combed; sickles, lesser sickles and coverts black; lesser coverts black with a rich green sheen.

Defects: White or gray in any part; too small or pinched; sickles straight; cut one half to one and one half. For carriage between thirty-five degrees and full squirrel position, cut one half to one and one half points. When carried positively to one side pass the specimen as unworthy.

Legs: Thighs medium in length with heavy muscles; color of plumage rich ferruginous. Shanks and feet yellow or reddish yellow, smooth in scale, and free from feathers or down.

Defects: Thighs too long; knees slightly turned inward; hock failing to show in profile below body line; cut out half to one and one half according to degree. Shanks too light in color, cut one half to one and one half, according to degree. Single crooked toes cut one point. Pass as unworthy generally deformed feet; positive knocked knees, and any other color than the shades of yellow.

Undercolor: Shafts (quills) of feathers matching surface color, fiber of lighter shade of same or mixed with gray.

Defects: White or black or any other color than described.

Rhode Island Reds, Female

Weights: Hen, six and a half pounds; pullet, five and one half pounds.

Comb: Pea, like that of the male, only smaller in proportion to weight of fowl.

Defects: Same as described for male.

Head: Medium long, skull medium wide, the crown slightly overhanging the eyes, face deep, the red showing well above the eyes. Eyes bright bay. Ear lobes and wattles fine in texture, small, but distinct and bright red in color. Beak medium stout at base, well curved to point, yellow or horn color shading to yellow, and may have a dark stripe shading down to mandible.

Defects: Same as for male except as indicated.

Neck: Medium in length and slightly arched, rich ferruginous color, free from black or any other color than described. Hackle sufficiently long to cover cape and shoulders.

Defects: Same as described for male.

Back: Medium long, cape medium broad and flat over small of back, which with back proper to hips makes a slightly inclined plane, the saddle taking a concave sweep to tail, plumage fairly abundant and of a rich ferruginous color.

Defects: Same as described for male.

Breast: Round and full, quarters prominent, muscles heavy, shoulder muscles rounding to keel bone, color ferruginous.

Defects: Same as described for male.

Body and Fluff: Keel bone straight with full keel muscles, color matching the breast and shading lighter to fluff, which is medium in development.

Defects: Same as described for male.

Wings: Bow well rounded, and in color rich ferruginous to match saddle proper, the coverts rich in a lighter shade of same color. Primaries, rich ferruginous and black, the former predominating; secondaries, rich ferruginous, in lower web of sufficient width to secure the wing bay of that color and turning the point and lacing or penciling the upper web of the secondaries in the same color, the balance of each feather may be black, the five feathers between secondaries and black matching the back and saddle in surface color.

Defects: Same as described for male.

Tail: Tail carried tolerably upright, spread laterally, extending at an angle as seen in the capital letter A, not too closely combed. Tail coverts moderately developed and showing the tips of the tail proper to the rear of the same. Tail proper, dark chestnut in color, which may shade into black at tips of feathers, coverts a rich ferruginous color.

Defects: Same as described for male except as to sickles.

Legs: Thighs medium in length with heavy muscles, feathered in a rich ferruginous color. Shanks and feet smooth in scale, yellow or may become straw colored with age.

Defects: Same as described for male.

Undercolor: Shalts (quills) if feathers matching surface color, fiber of lighter shade of same or mixed with gray.

Defects: Same as described for male.

The weights are heavy enough to insure a reasonably heavy carcass when dressed for market, and yet light enough to retain the excellent egg producing quality of the breed. The breeder with late hatched chick also has a chance at these weights at the fall shows.

The surface color of plumage should show red all over the fowl without striking contrasts in shades except for the black of wing and tail feathers. The surface color should not be endangered by excessive attention to undercolor. If the dark grey or slate undercolor is necessary to retain a sufficiently deep surface color or if it is correlated with the vigor and virility of the breed, it should not be sacrificed.

Strength of color in the young fowl is desirable, since the color is liable to fade with age, especially in females.

Breeders of single and rose comb Rhode Island Reds will very lightly insist that these varieties be allowed. The pea comb has the advantage of being very well adapted to the cold and variable climate of Rhode Island and the states of like latitude. It does not bring the breed into close competition with the buff varieties of Wyandottes and Plymouth Rocks. Several prominent members of the American Poultry Association have expressed the opinion that the pea comb Rhode Island Red would be readily recognized and admitted as a breed by the said association. Whether it is best to subject the breed to the somewhat artificial conditions entailed by the rules and regulations of the above mentioned association is a question to be settled by the breeders.

The aim has been to breed to a standard which would allow typical fowls of both sexes to be produced from "single matings." It is to be hoped that breeders of Rhode Island Reds will continue steadfast in the purpose to perfect this breed according to a standard which will not necessitate resorting to the unnatural scheme of "double matings" (so-called). It is also very desirable to so manage the breed that it shall retain its qualities of utility while gaining in uniformity, symmetry and beauty.

E. S.—You don't say how much grain and bran you fed the young ducks, but I fear you have been feeding too heavily. Use ground oats instead of corn meal, and add a tablespoonful of bone or beef meal to each quart of feed. One quart morning and evening is enough for fifteen young ducks when they are on free range. Young ducks should be shut up at night and not let out in the morning until the dew is off the grass. Ducks must have dry sleeping quarters. Crossing them with another variety would only spoil your present stock. Better get a good young Pekin drake before next spring, and feed your old ducks carefully through the winter. Breeding ducks should be in good condition, but not fat, for if there are ducklings hatched from their eggs they are sure to be weak and unprofitable. Give them a mash of equal parts of chopped clover or alfalfa hay, bran and stock feed (round corn and oats).

A MESSAGE TO THE WOMAN ON THE FARM

DEAR MADAM—

As the woman on the farm, the care of the chickens is in your hands. Friend husband does not pay much attention to the poultry end. He is concerned with his hogs, his cattle and his crops. He leaves the chickens to you, and the amount of money you make out of your flock is solely up to you.

Now, ask yourself, do you look after your poultry-raising as well as your husband looks after his interest? Are you as up-to-date in caring for your chickens as you husband is in caring for his hogs, cattle and fields? Or are you still pursuing the old-fashioned method of letting the chickens shift for themselves.

When your husband wants a new threshing machine, he buys it. When he finds it advisable to trade in his old automobile for a new one, he doesn't hesitate. When he wants a new hog pen, a new cattle barn or silo, he goes right ahead and gives his orders.

When he hears of a stock food that is good for cattle he gives it a trial. When he learns of a new tonic for hogs, he is eager to see what it will do for his herd. In other words, he is alway alive to every opportunity to secure better results and make more money.

You and Your Chickens

Now let us see what you do.

Looking over your favorite farm paper of an evening you see an advertisement that arouses your interest. You turn to friend husband and say: "John I see an egg tonic advertised which seems to do fine work according to the letters printed here. I think we should try it for our chickens. We're feeding them a lot of high priced corn and we're not getting anywhere near as many eggs as I think we should. I believe I'll just send for some of this tonic and give it a trial."

"Oh bosh," says John. "Sounds too good to be true. Don't pay any attention to it."

And as usual, you abide by your husband's judgment, and continue to plod along in the old-fashioned way.

John forgets that he uses stock foods and tonics for his cattle and hogs. He forgets that it is to new discoveries and new improvements that he owes much of his success as a farmer. He forgets that you, as the caretaker of the chickens, have just as much right to try for better results as he has in his work.

Of course, it is not that your husband is opposed to your making more money out of your flock. He is simply too busy with other matters to give serious consideration to chicken tonic. But is this quite fair to you?

Probably you depend on your chickens for your pin money, as many a woman does. And you surely have the right to try to make as much as you can.

Egg Tonic Has Come to Stay

There is no doubt about it, but a good egg tonic means more eggs. This has been proven over and over again. As a result, egg tonic will soon be used as universally as stock foods and hog tonics. The time is here when poultry raisers have to recognize this fact. They should not be misled by "wise" friends and neighbors who don't believe doing things any way but the old-fasnioned way.

We know what "TWO for ONE" will do for you. That is why we want you to try it. We don't make any money on a trial $1.00 and $2.00 box. The first order sold to a customer is sold at a loss. It is on the repeat orders that we make a profit. We are willing to stand a loss on the first order simply to get poultry raisers to try "TWO for ONE." We know that once it is tried, the flock-owner will buy more and more.

Ask yourself—could we for one minute think of selling the first order of "TWO for ONE" at a loss if there was a question as to the merit of this egg tonic. No indeed! We know the success of "TWO for ONE" and that is why we depend on future orders for our profit.

Since you have nothing to lose and much to gain, you owe it to yourself to give "TWO for ONE" a trial.

KINSELLA COMPANY.

"TWO for ONE"

"TWO for ONE" is the marvel of all egg tonics. It is the most remarkable producer of eggs ever known to the poultry world. "TWO for ONE" is making records every day in egg production that were never before believed possible. Flock owners all over the country are amazed with the results. The most experienced poultry experts say they have never seen the like of it.

"TWO for ONE" is not a mere food. It is an egg tonic in the truest sense of the term—a scientific preparation in concentrated tablet form—the result of scientific research and experiment. Every factor entering into the matter of egg production was scientifically studied.

As a result you have in "TWO for ONE" a tonic that conditions the hen for the utmost in laying capacity—that builds muscle and bone—that stimulates active functioning of the hen's reproductive organs—that insures fertile eggs and 100% hatchings—that makes the laggard lay and increases the production of active layers. A tonic that gets more eggs for you, winter and summer, than you ever thought possible.

Money-Back Guarantee

Don't take our word for it. Every box of "TWO for ONE" is sold under the distinct guarantee that if you are not entirely satisfied you get your money back. Take advantage of this offer and send for a box of "TWO for ONE" today.

Only $1.00 a box or our special offer of $2.00 for large box holding as much as three one dollar boxes—enough for an entire season. This costs you 1-15 of a cent a day, per hen, or less than 1c a dozen for the additional eggs you will receive from your flock.

Kinsella Co., 168 LeMoyne Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

Traps and Thrills on an Iowa Trail

By George J. Thiessen

CHAPTER III.

TRAP MYSTERY SOLVED. BOYS LEARN TRICKS FROM OLD TRAPPER.

THE old pelt hunter was more than angry. Not only did he tell my father and Mr. Lehrman but everyone else in the village as well. Few believed we disturbed his sets, and yet "boys will be boys," as one of the shoe-shop loafers expressed his opinion on the subject. But Fred and I knew he was prejudiced. He had the best apple orchard in town and remembered that he had chased us away from it a number of times. Naturally, our companions taunted us as did some of the men about the village. All in all, life hardly seemed worth living.

Jim's foot began to get better. The nail-wound had healed and he could hobble about. Really, if there had been no school, the boy would have been out and around sooner, but, as it was, he remained indoors. When he joined us again, we hoped to solve the mystery of the missing traps.

Then we got a clue. A neighbor lad of ten came home and claimed to have met a civet that showed fight. Diligent questioning, however, by the mother brought out the fact that he, with some other boys, had an encounter with the animal caught in a trap down near an old abandoned house. We investigated and found our missing property, together with St. John's. Some of the traps were hidden in a cave the boys had dug that summer in a clay-bank and the others were set in ground-hog dens.

At first we wondered how one or even two boys could have carried all the traps. We learned afterward that the leader with six others, had followed Fred and me on the trail and pulled the sets as fast as we made them. Then, returning, they picked up traps as they traveled. The gang was inspired by a reading of "Tom Sawyer," "The Leather Stocking Tales," and some lurid literature, so naturally, the boye decided to be pirates and hunters. They hid the traps and set a few later. Of course, we hurried to tell St. John the news, and straightway won his forgiveness. Naturally, he was sorry he had unjustly accused us and glad he had not got hold of us to give us the "hiding" he threatened.

As things had straightened themselves out, all concerned were happy and we felt it our duty to scare the younger boys who had been responsible for our trouble. Accordingly, we did so and felt satisfied. Of course, the people of Stanwood soon learned the truth and the parents of the pirate gang undoubtedly took steps to see that their sons got all their foolish notions out of their heads at once. The lads, led by an older one, had kept their secret much as Mark Twain's two heroes of fiction.

That afternoon I went down to see 'Gene Curran and his son. 'Gene, the father, was just home from his work. The son, Dave, was unusually industrious about the barn, hoping, perhaps, that the father had not heard that he belonged to the "outlaws." But the old gentleman was not in ignorance of the late news. Even though the boy did not have a hand in the theft, he was going to teach him some sense. From a nearby plum tree he cut a branch.

"What you doing?" I yelled, when I saw him. "It's too late to trim trees——"

"But not mischief-makers," he remarked, dryly. "Here, Dave, you come to the barn. I'm going to give you the worst licking you ever got."

And with that he set his dinner pail on the porch and took off his coat.

"But, listen," I exclaimed. "Dave didn't have anything to do with it at all. Now just wait a minute and I'll tell you all about what happened."

Not completely satisfied, he laid the switch upon the table within easy reach and started to wash his hands. The boy lingered near enough to hear, but yet just out of the father's reach.

"He ought to know better," Curran insisted, from time to time. "I tell you, he has been up to too many things lately not to get a lesson on what is right and wrong. A little 'dressing down' would do him good and——"

"Supper's ready," sang the wife.

Just to see that Dave did not get punished, I had to stay and help eat spareribs and sour-kraut, which was something I liked next to licorice candy. Anyway, the lad promised to be much better, and that ended the entire affair.

But the fact remained that we had much to do. The three of us did not dare play hookey from school and make our sets. Of course, we worked hard and put out as many traps as we could but it required most of the following Saturday to get the traps where we wanted them. And, best of all, we had good luck. Each morning we caught a number of muskrats, and once in a while a mink. St. John, possibly because he wanted to make up for his treatment toward us when we were under suspicion, helped with suggestions all he could. And the result of this was apparent. Daily we were adding to our catch.

One thing I particularly remember, and that was the old pelt hunter's suggestion about bait.

"Most beginners imagine," he said, "that all they need is a piece of meat by their sets to get the game. But this is not the truth. It requires a knowledge of wild life; their habits and the arrangement of the proper decoy in the right way. For instance, the other day I noticed a crow you had shot, placed near a mink slide. In the first place, such birds—and I include jays and similar—are worse than nothing at all. And bait of any kind placed too near a runway or den has a tendency to excite the suspicions of the cunning animals you have been trying to take."

"But we get mink once in a while," Fred ventured.

"True," he agreed, "only not with that kind of a crude set. Now if you had arranged the trap at the foot of the slide in water at that place, undoubtedly you would have caught several animals."

And, strange to say, when we followed the advice, it came true. At the spot between the roots of a tree which overhung the water, several pelts were added to our lot. After that, St. John never visited the shoe shop that we did not ask him something about taking fur. And when you consider that this was the hangout for practically all of Stanwood who had any time up-town, the frequency of our questions produced results. Next to Daniel Boone himself, the boys began to believe St. John the greatest pelt hunter in the world.

To add to our popularity, McKerron, Sr., got interested, too. He insisted on going along with us the following day. With no school to bother us, we did not rise early. Our traps were in good locations, arranged as best we knew. So that the man could get back to his work sooner, we paired off. Jim and Fred followed one route; the trail along Rock Creek. To myself and the guest were left the skunk traps we had just put out. By following the course as outlined, all confidently expected to reach home within five hours, at the latest. Our meeting place was at a railroad bridge about two miles from town, near what was known as Tipton Tank. Here, years ago, the old wood-burning locomotives used on that branch, stopped at a deep hole along a stream and got water.

EACH MORNING WE CAUGHT A NUMBER OF MUSKRATS.

More Letters and Photographs from COMFORT Trappers

$121.75 in Six Weeks

I have three dozen traps, with which I caught 53 muskrats, 2 raccoon, 1 mink, 10 skunks, 2 weasels and 3 opossum, which brought me $121.75. These furs were caught in six weeks' trapping. I was sick through December, so only got two traps two weeks in November and through January.

I sold first two weeks' catch December 21st for $85.75. I am sending picture of my furs.

TWO WEEKS' CATCH.

I sold my second two weeks' catch, consisting of six muskrats, 1 mink, 1 opossum and 2 skunks, January 18, for $26.00, and my last two weeks' catch, of 6 muskrats, January 30, for $10.00. For muskrats I seldom bait traps but set at slides, runways and feed beds. Hardly ever set traps at dens, as sometimes when one is caught it scares the others and causes them to leave. For skunk and opossum I use mostly bait pens and rabbit for bait, although any decayed meat is good. The best bird bait I have ever found for skunk is yellow hammer.

I think I did very well.

ELMER F. SNYDER, Ohio.

Got $300.00 for His Seventy-two Skins from a Fur House Which Advertised in COMFORT.

To be successful in trapping, one cannot just set his traps out in any old place at any old time and trust to luck, as most fur bearing animals are wily creatures.

Most failures in trapping are due to the fact that the trappers themselves overlook important minor details in this pursuit. This is not so much true of the first class or professional trapper as it is of the amateur or farmer boys who trap mainly for pleasure.

The principal fur bearing animals of this neighborhood are coyotes, lynx cats, weasel, civit cats, muskrats and badger. The coyotes are the most plentiful and I spend most of my time trapping them. They are very sly animals and are hard to catch, and one has to be very careful how he sets his traps.

The best time to trap them is in the fall. I start about November 1st, before the ground freezes up. Go to a place where the coyotes frequent and find a bare spot of ground. Drive a hardwood stake about two inches below the surface, then dig a place for two traps on opposite sides of the stake to which the chains should be attached. When this is done, arrange the traps in the trench and cover the jaws with a piece of paper, then cover everything over with dirt and take a bush and brush away all tracks and signs. Your tracks should be placed under about two and one half inches of dirt, as it will destroy the iron scent. I have used bait and scent with this set with equal success but scent is better where magpies are numerous.

For catching weasel I go out after a light snowfall, when they are easily tracked, and when I come to a place where they frequent I set a No. 1 Victor and cover with fine grass, bark, etc. Then I hang a piece of bloody meat or a bird six inches above it on a bush and in the morning you are pretty sure to have him.

Muskrat are not plentiful here and not many are caught. Bait does not work well here as they have too much to eat. Scent is the best in the springtime. I trap most of them at the foot of their slides and eating places where they dig for the roots of rushes.

So far this season I have caught 23 coyotes, 4 lynx cats, 5 weasels and 40 muskrats, in three dozen Victor traps. The main thing to do when you catch the animals is to skin and stretch them properly, also when ready clean all fat and grease off as it heats and affects the fur.

I have shipped all these furs and realized $300.00 for them. L. S. STUTZ, Idaho.

COMFORT'S Fur Forum

So many questions have been asked by trappers who have read the trapping articles in COMFORT and the free trapping books which we distribute and who rightfully regard COMFORT as a leading authority on trapping questions, that we have inaugurated a trapping questions-answered department, conducted by a recognized trapping authority of America. We shall be pleased to answer, free, any questions about trapping or marketing furs. All questions must be signed with the writer's full name, which will not be published if the writer so requests. Address Trapping Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Questions Answered

Q.—How can one prevent the many muskrats escaping from twisting out of traps?

A.—When ordinary styles are used, stake in deep water so the animals drown.

Q.—Are birds good bait?

A.—Some are; others should be avoided. Crows, hawks and owls seem worthless even when plucked.

Q.—What way is best to be a professional trapper?

A.—There are many things that must be observed before you become an expert. Perhaps the most important is a study of the fur bearers. Know where they may be found, how they live, what they eat, etc. Time spent in doing this pays well. Send for COMFORT's free trapping book.

Q.—Is there any sure way to know if a skunk den is inhabited or not?

A.—Generally speaking, no. On the other hand, signs such as tracks, etc., can be relied upon quite accurately. Again, if there are long black, white, or black and white hairs, one may make sets with good chances of success. These are generally to be seen clinging to the sides of the burrows. A good flashlight will be of value in discovering.

Q.—Are there two kinds of muskrats; those that build houses and those that have burrows?

A.—No. Where there is little or no current, the animals usually have houses. Where water is deep and the current fast, dens are to be found. However, there are exceptions and houses can be seen in streams and dens along the banks of lakes.

Q.—Can one tan his furs?

A.—Yes—but it doesn't pay. There are too many chances of spoiling the pelts. Let a tanner do this for you.

Q.—Does it pay to hold furs for higher prices?

A.—No. The pelt hunter cannot afford to speculate with the skins he takes.

Q.—Would a fur farm pay?

A.—Most of the money in fur farming has been made, with the possible exception of the large fox ranches and the leased muskrat swamps—if the latter could be termed a fur farm—in the sale of stock in companies and animals for breeding purposes.

Q.—What is the most valuable of all furs?

A.—Black fox brings most.

Q.—Where can I find out about trapping laws?

A.—Consult your local game warden or write to your state capitol, Game and Fish Dept., for a copy of the statutes.

Q.—Do mink den up in cold weather?

A.—No. They travel in all kinds of weather. However, warm, rainy nights are best for taking them.

Q.—What is meant by a "blind" set?

A.—This is a concealed set without bait or decoy. However, some pelt hunters use the term to designate traps used with bait nearby although the first explanation is the one most generally accepted.

Q.—Should raccoon be cut down the belly?

A.—Fur dealers prefer them stretched this way although in some sections most of the hides are cased.

Q.—What are the advantages of steel stretchers?

A.—Uniformity of shape in the skins; ease by which furs may be handled; quick drying, etc.

Q.—Are there any wolverine in Nebraska where there are lots of wolves?

A.—Wolves and wolverine are two different species. The latter inhabits the cold climates and not the plains.

Q.—What is a brown weasel?

A.—This is an unprime—a name given by fur dealers to skins of animals taken too early or too late. When prime, the weasel is pure white with the exception of the tip of the tail. This is black. Buyers usually designate prime weasels as "ermine."

Q.—Can rabbit skins be sold?

A.—Yes, write the dealers who advertise in COMFORT. They offer a market.

Q.—Should I tan my furs before shipping?

A.—By all means no. Simply stretch and dry in a cool place and then they are ready for market. It takes from four to ten days, depending upon climatic conditions, for skins to cure.

Eradicating Tuberculosis of Animals

THE Bureau of Animal Industry, of the Department of Agriculture at Washington, D. C., now is actively associating itself with livestock sanitary boards of practically every stock breeding state in the eradication of tuberculosis in cattle and hogs. This new activity in the campaign against tuberculosis has become necessary in view of the fact that the disease has been increasing despite all that has been done against it in past years. To illustrate this it may be mentioned here that during the month of May, 1919, the last month for which complete figures are available, 4.2 per cent of the cattle tested in 45 states were found to be affected with the disease and showed some of its symptoms. Government figures also show that nearly 10 per cent of the swine killed where Federal inspection is maintained, had the disease. In 1916 it was 9 per cent and in 1917 about 10 per cent. Indications are that the disease is spreading, it therefore behooves every interested person to do his part in eradicating the disease.

Cause and Nature of Tuberculosis

The disease is the counterpart of consumption of man and is caused by a microscopic germ or bacillus. It affects principally cattle and swine, but under favoring circumstances may also affect almost all other animals. In a different form it affects poultry, and indeed is very common among them. Bird, or "avian" tuberculosis as it is called, is not communicable to man, but tuberculosis of cattle and hogs is. The disease is communicated to man, chiefly infants, by raw milk, or by insufficiently cooked meat of an affected animal. The disease causes formation of nodules or tubercles in the glands and tissues and these so impair function that the animal in time becomes weakened, emaciated and poisoned so that it succumbs. After death one finds gritty yellow, cheesy deposits in the affected parts.

How the Disease Is Contracted

The germs may enter by way of the nostrils when affected animals "nose" one another; but more commonly it is contracted by way of the digestive organs. Calves and pigs take it from milk of affected cows, or from diseased udders. Skim-milk, whey or buttermilk from creameries and cheese factories carries the disease to the animals on farms unless pasteurized. Hogs also take the disease from feeding after affected cattle. The germs are passed with the manure and contaminate corn eaten by the swine. Cattle may become infected when shipped on the railroad, penned with diseased stock in markets or at fairs and sale stables, or when pastured or driven over fields and roads where diseased cattle have been. Usually it is brought onto a farm in feed or with new bought animals.

Symptoms of Tuberculosis

Often the disease has been present a long time before its effects become manifest. Then emaciation, weakness, coarse, staring hair and hidebound skin, sunken, swimming eyes and chronic cough with more or less discharge from the nostrils indicate its presence. Those are the symptoms when the lungs are badly affected. It may cause swellings of the glands under the jaws or below the ears and these give rise to loud or labored breathing. If the gullet is pressed upon by enlarged glands, chronic bloating is caused. When the udder is invaded, hard, painless lumps form and often a large one is seen in the gland high above the back of the udder. Hogs fail to thrive when affected with tuberculosis and the tubercles invade all of the tissues, including the meat. That is rare in cattle. After death, yellow nodules are found on lungs, liver, spleen, kidneys, etc., and may also invade the brain, heart, bones and generative organs. No part is exempt. In poultry the liver most commonly is attacked, but other organs also show characteristic yellow tubercles.

Detecting Tuberculosis

One may suspect tuberculosis when any of the above mentioned symptoms are seen. It always should be suspected also if an animal has any mysterious sickness which does not respond to treatment and which gradually causes emaciation and ill-thrift. Suspect it when a cow has unexplained attacks of garget which come and go, or has difficulty in rising and is stiff or sore or has swollen joints. Always consider it likely that tuberculosis is the cause when a cow has a chronic cough and especially if she grunts or otherwise evinces pain when the fingers are thrust hard into the spaces between the ribs just behind the elbows. The elbows often are turned outward in such cases, for the lungs then are badly affected with tuberculosis. Testing with tuberculin is, however, the only sure and reliable way of determining the presence of tuberculosis.

How the Tuberculin Test Is Made

Tuberculin is a broth in which the germs of tuberculosis have been cultivated until no more will grow. They are then killed and the liquid then contains an element which irritates a tuberculous animal when injected under the skin. Tuberculin contains no live germs and so cannot possibly cause the disease, nor can it in any way injure an unaffected animal. The irritation it causes is indicated by a rise in temperature which goes up gradually for a time and as gradually returns to normal. This is termed the "rainbow curve," and if absent the rise in temperature scarcely indicates the presence of tuberculosis. Before testing, cattle are housed and accustomed to the stable if they have been on pasture. Testing in very hot weather is unwise. The temperature is taken morning, noon and night of one day to determine the normal temperature, which in health is from 101 to 102½ degrees Fahrenheit. At 9 or 10 o'clock P. M. of the same day tuberculin is injected under the skin of the neck or behind the shoulder. Starting at 5 or 6 o'clock the next morning the temperature is taken every two hours. If the temperature then rises two or more degrees, is sustained at that for some time and then gradually falls, the animal is considered tuberculous and has to be disposed of according to Federal and state law. Often the temperature runs to 105 or 106. In some cases we have seen it reach 107 degrees and the reacting animal usually is off feed, sick and may scour. The veterinarian regulates the dose of tuberculin according to the age and size of the animal, or her condition. At least one cubic centimeter, or 15 drops, is injected for each 500 pounds of body weight. The average dose has been about two cubic centimeters in the past, but under new rules larger doses are used and may in some instances run to seven cubic centimeters, as in the case of a 2,000-pound bull. The veterinarian is fully instructed as to the correct dose to use and how to interpret the effects of the injection. Only a trained expert is qualified to apply the test and tests by owners are not officially recognized nor do they entitle the owner to reimbursement for animals condemned on account of the disease. The Government allows not to exceed $25 for a grade cow or $50 for a pure-bred cow; but the owner also is allowed 80 per cent of the proceeds when the meat is marketed as fit for that purpose. Various states have similar reimbursement laws and the state veterinarian will be glad to inform owners as to all such matters on application in writing.

Controlling the Disease

When testing has proved a herd to be clean, it may be kept clean by testing all new-bought animals twice a year and keeping the clean animals away from strange cattle, public highways, fairs and markets, unless for slaughter. Show animals have to be quarantined on their home farm and tested twice a year. All milk brought in from outside has to be pasteurized by heating to at least 145 degrees F. for at least 20 minutes before feeding to calves or pigs.

If a case is discovered, the animal has to be disposed of according to law, then the stable must be cleansed, disinfected and whitewashed under direction of a veterinarian, and the cattle tested at least twice a year. Under certain conditions, affected cows may be used for breeding purposes, according to the Bang method, but the calves must not take any milk from an affected cow or remain with her after birth. Arrangements may be made to have herds tested free by Government and state veterinarians, and herds that pass two tests without a reaction, at intervals not exceeding six months, may be put on the "accredited" list by the state livestock sanitary board.

Team Work in Farming

So scarce and expensive is hired help getting to be in many parts of the country and so high is the price of farm machinery that new methods of working are coming into vogue to meet the situation. Small farmers cannot afford to own tractors or engines powerful enough to fill silos or operate threshing machines. But many a small farmer finds it impossible to get his silo filled in time, or to get the thresher to come to him for a few stacks, or to have his corn shredding done promptly when other big jobs in the district attract the professional thresherman, who also operates silo cutters and fillers, shredders or clover hullers, etc. These facts are leading men in farming districts to combine and cooperate for the ownership and operation of needed engines, separators, hullers, shredders and silage cutters. Tractors, in some instances, also are being bought for community work, and where men can agree properly and take their fair and legal share of the working time and capacity of the engine or combination of machines, the plan works well for all concerned. In some instances we know of several brothers who have so combined and they usually take in with them other relations farming in the same district. By team work they get their grain threshed out of the shock to save expensive stacking, have their silos filled on time, when corn is just right, although other men in the district may be busy with tobacco harvest which often interferes with silo filling. By sharing the expense the burden is not too great for one individual and the work really is done at less expense than otherwise would be the case.

In many districts our readers might make such combinations for team work and would then find their farm work much less difficult to plan for and accomplish on time and to the best advantage.

Sow Ergot Free Rye

Our readers have been instructed several times that rye infested with ergot, often erroneously termed "smut," is dangerous to livestock. It may cause abortion in cows and swine and in horses cause paralysis of the throat. Other less severe results may show in animals fed ergot in varying quantities. During winter when young cattle are wading in snow and slush, ergot impairs circulation of blood in the extremities and sores or sloughing may occur about the feet and pasterns. Tails, feet and horns have been known to slough off.

Rye becomes ergot infested from spores due to the ergot crop of the previous year and to spurs of ergot sown with the rye seed in fall or spring. For this reason rye seed should be perfectly cleaned to free it of ergot before it is used. Here is the way to do it, as discovered and taught by plant pathologists of the Wisconsin Agricultural Experiment Station: Make a salt brine of about 20 per cent strength by dissolving 40 pounds of common salt in 25 gallons of water. Have this solution in a tub, barrel or other suitable receptacle. When the salt is well dissolved, pour in the rye slowly and stir vigorously at the same time. It takes two persons to do this. The ergot and light seeds will rise to the surface and the sound kernels will sink to the bottom. Skim off the ergot or add rye until the solution rises and runs over the side of the tub, carrying the ergot with it. If the ergot does not float, the solution should be made stronger by the addition of more salt. The dryness of the grain makes a difference in the strength of solution necessary. The solution should be poured off as the ergot is removed and the grain washed with fresh water and dried. Otherwise the grain will dry slowly and its germinating qualities be injured. The wet grain should be spread thinly on a clean floor or canvas and shoveled over a few times.

Utilizing Cheap Horses

So great and extensive has been the drought in Montana and some other western states that cattle, sheep and horses have starved in some localities and throughout the dry areas have suffered fearfully from lack of feed. For this reason sheep and cattle are being shipped out of the drought-stricken districts to those in which cheap grazing is available. Minnesota and Wisconsin offer such grazing grounds and are being widely utilized while northern Michian is taking some surplus stock. But what to do with the cheap, light horses that are consuming feed that might better be given to cattle and sheep is a problem. It does not pay to ship the horses to market, or to distant grazing grounds. The consequence is that we hear of sales of horses around $5.00 a head, while in some districts sales cannot be made at any price.

Under the circumstances it is being proposed that the meat of these cheap, light horses should be used for human consumption. To that end it is suggested that canning of horse flesh should be started on a considerable scale, for such meat would be welcomed in Europe, where it has long been used. In Paris and cities of Belgium horse meat markets have long been patronized and some of our returning soldiers report that they have eaten horse meat and found it "not so bad." It is much darker in color than beef and in some cases is almost black, besides being coarser in grain and having a somewhat unpleasant odor. This meat also is sweet in taste as it contains glycogen; but people come to like it and there is no question as to its value as a nutrient. Recognizing the horse slaughtering industry as one that is to grow, the Federal Bureau of Animal Industry now is inspecting all horses intended for slaughter for meat, as none that have certain diseases are fit for that purpose and must be carefully discarded. Then, too, the slaughtering places must be run on a sanitary basis and everything done in the best possible manner as regards handling of the meat products. Sausage is one of the products most used in the market, as it keeps and ships well. Horse hides also are valuable and needed. All horse flesh offered for human food must be plainly labeled just what it is so the people will not be imposed upon if they do not care to buy such meat.

The Cement Stave Silo

The cement stave silo is growing very rapidly in popularity. Why? Because it combines the advantages of the solid concrete silo with those of the wooden stave. What are some of these advantages?

CONCRETE FIREPROOF AND PERMANENT.—The strong talking point for the solid concrete silo is that it is fireproof and permanent. Winds do not blow it down. It never rots or needs painting. It needs no repairs. All these things are claimed for the cement stave. If the hoops rust, which they may in time, they can be quickly and cheaply covered with paint.

STAVE SILO QUICKLY BUILT.—It takes time to build a solid concrete silo. One of staves may be built in a day. It takes but little more time to build one of cement staves. A solid foundation which must be laid for all types of silo is put down and as soon as it is ready the staves are set up. They are short, easily handled and go up rapidly.

CEMENT STAVES MAY BE ADDED TO.—One often wants to build higher after the silo is up. An additional five, ten or twenty feet may be easily added to the cement stave silo the next year or at any time after building.

There are now a good many concerns making cement staves for silos, so that it should not be a difficult matter to purchase them in any locality.

Silage from Dry Corn

Can silage be made from dry corn late in the fall or early winter? Yes. Though not quite so good or so greatly relished by cattle, a very good silage can be made from corn that has stood for a month or two in the shock.

In making silage from dry corn it should be remembered that this corn has lost a great deal of moisture while standing in the shock. This

419 EGGS FROM 20 HENS IN 30 DAYS

Mr. Dougherty Got This Result in October. Plan is Easily Tried.

"I tried Don Sung and the results were far past any expectations. I got 419 eggs in 30 days from 20 hens while moulting. I think this is wonderful, as they hardly laid at all before while moulting."—Frank Dougherty, 5940 E. 11th St., Indianapolis.

Mr. Dougherty bought $1 worth of Don Sung tablets in October and wrote the above letter in November. Figure his profit on 35 dozen eggs from hens that formerly laid little or nothing.

This may sound too good to be true, but it costs nothing to find out. We'll make you the same offer we made him.

Give your hens Don Sung and watch results for one month. If you don't find that it pays for itself and pays you a good profit besides, simply tell us and your money will be promptly refunded.

Don Sung (Chinese for egg-laying) works directly on the egg-laying organs, and is also a splendid tonic. It is easily given in the feed, improves the hen's health, makes her stronger and more active in any weather, and starts her laying.

Try Don Sung for 30 days and if it doesn't get you the eggs, no matter how cold or wet the weather, your money will be refunded by return mail. Get Don Sung from your druggist or poultry remedy dealer or send 50 cents for a package by mail prepaid. Burrell-Dugger Co., 445 Columbia Bldg., Indianapolis, Ind.

Stop Foolish Trapping

Many a novice in the trapping game, and sometimes a wind-bitten old timer will trap breeding females and take the pelts, and each feels that he has done no harm. One is carried away, perhaps, by his enthusiasm, another by the fear that some other fellow may get ahead of him.

But under whatever delusion they may labor, they are committing the penny wise but pound foolish axiom of the outdoors.

Trapping during breeding seasons does not pay, and the man who traps them not only robs himself once but does so twice. First, he kills an animal that should be allowed to live and propagate its kind, which, of course, means more money for the trapper eventually, since there will be more animals to trap.

The sportsman or professional trapper who realizes these two facts—both mean money to him if heeded—has made a great step toward the conservation of our fur-bearing animal resources.

Boys just starting out with their first traps should realize this and follow it. Indeed, the taking of furs during the breeding season brings so little in return that it is scarcely worth one's time or trouble to trap for them.

Of course, a knowledge of when to trap and how to trap is essential if this conservation idea of furs only is to be carried out.

Write to any of the big fur houses. They will send you the game laws of the different states and the laws are usually made to fit local conditions. So, if you follow the game laws, you can't go far wrong.

BOY NETS NINETY-SIX DOLLARS WITH FOUR TRAPS

Yes! Lambert Bailey of Volga, Ia., writes that he trapped 24 skunks last season with only four traps and received $96.00 for his catch. And the remarkable part of it is, he trapped only during his spare time. Get busy, boys! Fur prices are going sky high. Write Becker Bros. today for their FREE trapping guide and price list. For more than 34 years they have established a policy of grading furs right up to the limit, which has assured thousands of shippers 100 cents on every dollar's worth of furs shipped. sit right down now and write Becker Bros. Got $135.00 for Season's Catch

I began to trap in November, 1918, and caught 9 civets, 4 muskrats, 50 skunks, 2 badgers, 2 coyotes. I used Jack Rabbit bait for civet and skunks.

ONE NIGHT'S CATCH.

A good way to catch a muskrat: Take two No. 1 Victor traps, make a mound of mud along a creek bank or in shallow water. On top of the mound of mud put an apple or an ear of corn on a stick about nine inches high. Fasten the traps to iron or stone and stake in the water beside the mound.

I made altogether about $135. I shipped my last furs March 15, 1919.

I am sending one of my pictures of myself and rifle, 1 coyote and two skunks. It was a two nights' catch. I am fifteen years old.

ARTHUR CROSS, Nebraska.

It Pays to Read About Trapping

Having had no experience in trapping or no trapper to learn from, I began to study all I found in the papers about trapping. I got many helpful hints on trapping in COMFORT.

Early in the fall of 1918 I began to look for signs of fur bearing animals. After having spent a great deal of my spare time looking for signs I picked out a trap line. It was short enough that I could go to it every day.

I set traps for the animals as their fur became prime. I had twenty traps and took eleven skunks, 2 raccoons, 5 opossum, 3 mink and 1 fox. I sold them to a regular dealer and received $62.75. This paid for a Liberty Bond which I had bought and $12.75 to help pay for my traps. The traps will last several years, so will have all I earn next year clear.

I found that it paid to read all you could about trapping. A friend of mine said he knew as much as the papers did about trapping. So he didn't waste his time reading them. He bought 24 traps and when he sold his fur he had to borrow $3.70 from his father to finish paying for his traps.

Yours truly,
MARSHALL MCKEAND, Indiana.

Good Catch for Twelve Traps

The picture does not show my catch quite complete. It shows 23 muskrats, 2 minks and 3 moles. After that I caught 1 skunk, 2 muskrats and 1 mole. I had 12 traps set and all of the furs were salable. I sold them to two of the fur dealers whose ads I saw in COMFORT.

Q.—Are ground-hog furs good?
A.—These have no market value.

Q.—Where are civets found?
A.—This fur bearer inhabits the Middle West. But few are taken east of the Mississippi River. The animals are very numerous in Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri and similar sections.

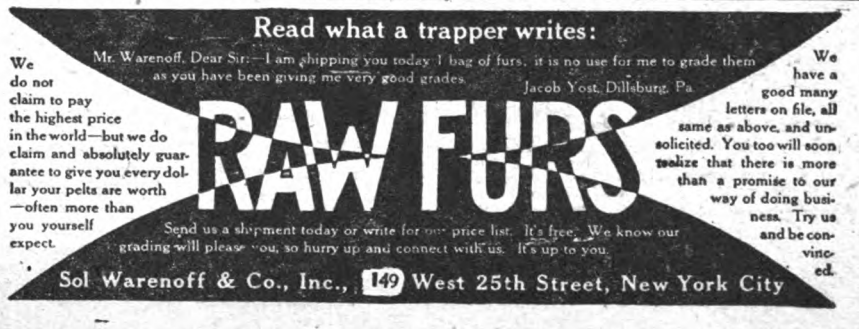
Q.—Where are the best mink taken?
A.—Generally speaking, the animals of the North are all of fine quality and it would be hard to designate just where the best skins come from. Undoubtedly those from the northern New England states rank among the best, both for color and quality.

Q.—What is the easiest fur bearer to trap?
A.—Skunk and civet do not require much skill, neither do muskrat with water sets. The marten is not hard to take, either, often springing naked traps.

Q.—Will rotten eggs draw fox?
A.—Some trappers use them as a lure for the animals and get good results. However, some of the other attractors will be found better.

Q.—Do animals die when they gnaw off a foot?
A.—In many cases, yes. This is particularly true of muskrats. Where they are numerous and trapped to any great extent, carcasses will be found with the foot amputated. On the other hand, however, many survive. They are frequently caught again and the hides go to make up beautiful garments.

Q.—Can I tan mink at home?
A.—It may be done, only it is best to get a tanner to do this. Too many skins are spoiled when attempted by the amateur.



Q.—Can one raise skunks after trapping them?
A.—Skunks are one of the easiest of all animals to keep in captivity.

Q.—Will ferrits drive out mink?
A.—Only a few of the larger males can be depended upon to do this.

Q.—What is a dead-fall?
A.—Generally speaking, it is a heavy weight supported by a stick or something similar and arranged so that when the bait is disturbed the object falls, crushing the animal underneath.

Q.—How many skunks live in a den?
A.—Often ten or twelve.

Talks with Girls

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In writing this department always sign your true name and give your address; if not, your letter will receive no attention. Name will not be published.

GIRLS, girls, how time does fly! Only a short time ago I was cautioning you against sunburn and freckles and now it is time for you to put on your winter "undies." To those who live in a cold climate, don't make the mistake of thinking you can wear summer-weight underwear throughout the winter and get away with it successfully. Sooner or later you will pay the penalty by years of ill health. Most of us are given strong, healthy bodies and it is our duty to show our appreciation to the Giver of all Good by taking intelligent care of ourselves.

Run along and help Mother get the Thanksgiving dinner ready and I'll see what tangles we have to unravel this month.

MRS. A. A. M., N. Mex.—Typewritten manuscript is preferred by all publishers and the only kind considered by certain ones, so have yours neatly typewritten, one side of paper only; fold, do not roll, and then unless you have every reason to believe your work is reasonably good, do not send it. Thus you will save postage, Uncle Sam's time, and gain the thanks of some tired editor whose brain is in a whirl from reading letters beginning: "I have wrote a storie for your paper. Cousin Susie says it is the best storie she ever read and if you will publish my storie she will subscribe for your paper." Don't give up if you possess talent but be sure you do possess it.

WILD CANARY, Montana.—If dances are the only form of entertainment your town affords, I haven't the heart to tell you not to go, for youth must have some pleasures and you will be properly chaperoned if both your father and older sister accompany you. What's the matter with the mothers of A————? Why don't they get together and devise ways and means of keeping their young people suitably entertained? (2) Have the material you mention made up in separate waist and skirt or combined (if suitable) in a one-piece dress.

LEORA, Okla.—Ask the Sisters, from whom you take music lessons, if they consider you capable of teaching beginners. Personally, I think it unwise both for you and the beginners but I'm not an authority.

TWO NEBRASKA MAIDS, Nebraska.—The girl in a small town, or city for that matter, is placed in rather an awkward position, for if she accepts the attentions of several men she is regarded as a flirt and talked about accordingly, or else she is obliged to keep "steady company" with one whom, perhaps, she doesn't care about, but finally marries more from habit than love. It requires skill and tact to know where to draw the dividing line. (2) I prefer not to enter into religious discussions; sometimes such marriages turn out happily and again they do not. Talk it over frankly and seriously with him.

B.—If you have good health and a thorough knowledge of household duties, and are twenty-one years of age, it would seem that your parents shouldn't object to your marriage on the grounds that you are too young to undertake the responsibilities of married life, particularly when your fiance is in every way desirable. Try to win their consent if possible, even if it means waiting a while longer.

MILDRED, Florida.—Destroying the roots of the hair by use of the electric needle is the only sure cure for superfluous hair. It should be done by a skilled practitioner.

BLUE EYES, Tenn.—If you think that life without the "rough boy that drinks whiskey" (wonder where he gets it now?) would be "something awful," just marry him and see how much worse it will be. Don't run away with him but tell him if he is willing to reform and make good for your sake you will wait for him. Don't marry the other fellow just because your parents want you to. That wouldn't be fair to him or to yourself.

MAMMA'S BABY DOLL, Texas.—Don't fool yourself, dearie, in thinking that country people are "backward and silly," and that you can't be happy until you go back to town to stay. When girls of sixteen spell as outrageously as you do they aren't so far from being in the "backward" class themselves. If you realize that you have the "best old homely mother in the world" (your mother should be beautiful in your eyes), don't you think you had better stay with her and try to show your love and appreciation while you have the opportunity? So many girls do not realize until too late that they have the best mother in the world. Stay home two or three years longer, anyway, and fit yourself for something besides work as waitress.

SIMPLICITY, Montana.—H'm, maybe not so much so, after all. Sure, go ahead and propose to the "wealthy gentleman of seventy-one" or send me his name and address and I'll do it, though I sadly realize that I can't hope to compete with your seventeen-year-old charms. The older they are the younger they like 'em. So you think the marriage you mention would place you in a "higher sphere" than "juggling prunes." Nursing is considered one of the noblest professions. I do think that "juggling prunes" is a much more ladylike and refined expression than "slinging hash," and I'll remember it and use it on every possible occasion. (2) The man who gets down on his knees and sweetly warbles: "I have tried all in vain many times to propose," is wasting his talents on you. He should be on the stage. Maybe that constitutes a real proposal, but I'd prefer the plain, honest, will-you-marry-me kind. (3) No, I wouldn't marry a man who had been married twice before. Whatever in the world made you think I would?

MRS. C., Arkansas.—If the relative you mention is not actually dependent upon your husband for support, it would seem unnecessary for your home to be spoiled by his presence, and your husband should consider your wishes and happiness. There are good schools he could attend so why not compromise and have him spend vacations with you? He has got to go to school anyway and perhaps in time you can feel differently toward him.

FIGHTING TOMMY, Oklahoma.—If your chum's brother annoys you so much every time you go there, don't go. That's easy, isn't it? And if you "hate like everything" to dance with him, why do you do it? Avoid him.

PRETTY THING, Indian Valley.—Eleven o'clock is too late for a fourteen-year-old girl to be out riding with a boy; in fact, she shouldn't be out anyway, and certainly not so late as that. Of course if you had tire trouble or a breakdown it couldn't be helped. You were on horseback? 'Scuse me, dear, 'scuse me. Very careless of me but it wasn't proper whatever way you went.

PEGGY, San Antonio, Texas.—Some boys at twenty-one are as mature as the average young man of twenty-five, and if the one you mention belongs in that class I don't think the fact that you are one year older than he is should prevent your marriage. Anyway, I'd take a chance if I wanted him.

FERN, Illinois.—Cedar chests make the best hope boxes but they may be made of anything—ordinary boxes covered with pretty cretonne make nice ones. They should contain everything you will need in the way of linen for your home, from the finest embroidered articles to dish towels.

ALMA, Missouri.—If you are nineteen and your lover is sixteen I do not think it proper for you to be married, but if he is twenty-five and you are twenty-eight it would be all right. Don't ever get careless about your personal appearance, though. This applies with equal force to wives that are younger than their husbands.

LAURA, La.—There isn't enough difference between your two callers for me to tell which would be better for you to select for a sweetheart but I think you'd better take the other one. You might try saying "Eeny, meeny, miney, mo."

AN ORPHAN, N. C.—When boys of sixteen marry it isn't at all surprising that a divorce follows, and unless there was something particularly disgraceful connected with the case it doesn't seem that you should hold it against him now. Marry him if you love him and he loves you and tell your step-relatives to go chase themselves. That isn't polite but neither are they.

A. AND A, Missouri.—Thee is about the right difference between your ages. (2) A diamond is the usual thing for an engagement ring but the proper thing is just what your fiance can afford. Don't let him buy it on the installment plan. Lots of nice folks don't have engagement rings at all while others use their birthstone instead of a diamond. I think that is a pretty idea. (3) Don't say "Most properest." It isn't.

Now we are even. You have your respective dinners ready and I have your respective troubles and questions taken care of and can sit me down to my own table with a clear conscience.

Hoping you are the same,

COUSIN MARION.

inches of his tail and one ear—shot away. Otherwise he was unhurt and still far from being a dead dog. The driving snow wrapped him in a mantle of invisibility. Unseen, unheard, he shook the icy water from him and turned his nose toward the valley. The dip in the creek had washed the last taste of the soap from his mouth, but the memory of this day's persecutions would stay with him forever. Forever, then, he turned his back upon the Bartlett grounds, and vanished in a dog trot and the gathering darkness.

Buster Smith sat at the supper table. In his heart there was sorrow, deep sorrow, and gloom, black gloom, sat upon his chubby little face. The white napkin about his neck was unspotted with grease. His hands, too, were clean, and on his cheeks was a total absence of those smears which accumulate when little boys eat turkey. A huge drumstick lay untouched upon his plate.

At noon it had been the same way. The Jake Smiths were beginning to be worried.

"Where you sick, son?" grunted Jake, solicitously, with his mouth full of cranberry sauce.

Buster's lower lip quivered. He gravely placed one hand on the approximate region of his heart.

"Wonder what Fuzzy's doin' now?" he reflected, jamming a knuckle of the other hand into his eye.

There was a scratch at the door, and a whine.

Buster slipped from his seat. There is a telepathic affinity between dogs and small boys that laughs at doors. He turned the knob. The door opened, and over the threshold, with a whirl of snowflakes, tumbled Fuzzy, dirty, bedraggled, half-frozen, maimed almost beyond recognition, but leaping and bounding with sheer, exuberant joy.

An ear-splitting whoop, thirteen steps of a Choctaw war dance, and Buster was back upon his chair. The drumstick was demolished. Grease and gravy and mashed potatoes soon smeared his face and napkin as copiously as any mother could desire.

Mrs. Smith turned her back for a moment, and, dexterously, a wing was snaked off the platter.

"'Peak for it, Fuzzy," gurgled Buster, holding the wing at arm's length. "'Peak for it."

In the heart of Fuzzy, as he rose to his hind legs and barked, there was a great Thanksgiving. Never again would he be Algernon, the prize Pomeranian. Gone was his silver collar, gone his flawless beauty, gone his very identity—shot away. He was only a dirty, frowsy, ugly, one-eared, plebian pup, and that which he wagged so joyously was only the pitiful stump of a tail.

But who cared for that? Who cared—who cared?

A Whole Toy Town!

Boys and Girls—Can You Imagine it? A Complete Village Of Houses, Stores, Shops And All! You Can Build And Re-build It As Often As You Like!

25 Different Buildings With Yards And Streets

Premium No. 8522

FUN, fun, fun—that's what you'll have when you get this wonderful new toy town, with its streets, yards, houses, stores, shops and men, women and children, just like any real town. Only think! Twenty-five different buildings—and you can build them, take them down and build them again as often as you please. You can call it "your own town" and talk to the people living in the houses, walking and driving in the streets and working in the shops—the blacksmith at his forge in the blacksmith shop, the children going to school, the customers in the stores and hotel and even the little boys and girls playing "Indian" and "soldier" in the dandy big tent on the bank of the beautiful river that flows under the bridge. Remember—twenty-five buildings make quite a big town—bigger than some real towns we know of.

In this wonderful toy town village there are thirteen handsome up-to-date houses, a tent, church, high school savings bank, hotel, clubhouse, barber shop, bakery, blacksmith shop, express office, garage and police station, besides all the streets, yards and flowers, river and bridge. They are made of thick heavy cardboard printed in natural colors so that they look like real houses while the streets, yards and flowers are colored true to life. Full directions tell you how to put all the different buildings together, how to lay out your town and place the houses on the streets. When the houses are all up your town will measure nearly three square feet in size.

We will give you this wonderful toy town complete as described above on the terms of the following special

Vapo Cresolene

ESTABLISHED 1879

The Inhalation Treatment for Whooping-Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Influenza, Coughs, Bronchitis.

"USED WHILE YOU SLEEP"

Simple, safe and effective, avoiding internal drugs.

Vaporized Cresolene relieves the paroxysms of Whooping-Cough and Spasmodic Croup at once; it nips the common cold before it has a chance of developing into something worse, and experience shows that a neglected cold is a dangerous cold.

Mrs. Ballington Booth says: "No family, where there are young children, should be without this lamp."

The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inhaled with every breath, makes breathing easy and relieves the congestion, assuring restful nights.

It is called a boon by Asthma sufferers.

Cresolene relieves the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles, and is a valuable aid in the treatment of Diphtheria.

It is a protection to those exposed.

Cresolene's best recommendation is its 40 years of successful use.

Sold by Druggists. Send for descriptive booklet 24.

Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated Throat, composed of slippery elm bark, licorice, sugar and Cresolene. They can't harm you. Of your druggist or from us, 10c. in stamps.

Sister, when there is so much praise given mother, doesn't father deserve a little praise, too? I think so, but then, my father is the best ever.

Will some of the sisters, or brothers (I am so glad they came) living near the ranches or on ranches, please write, especially young people as I am not so very old myself. Like Marion Baier I envy you the golden west.

To those whom I sent the widow's mite last December, I received grateful letters from all but lost the address of some. Appreciated your thanks though.

I'll leave my address with Mrs. Wilkinson and then go.

God be with you, every one.

RAINY DAY.

Rainy Day.—Pardon me, but you are nothing of the sort—you are a beautiful sunshiny day with a blue sky and flowers. That's what you are. And we think your poem, "The Answering Time Will Come," a very helpful and encouraging one.—Ed.

TENNESSEE.

"Oh! Tennessee! Thou poet's fount of joy!
I love thy pleasant fields, thy rugged hills,
And oh! may naught thy beauty e'er destroy—
Not e'en so much as mar thy feeblest rills.
Here shall my harp fore'er responsive be
And sing thy praise, mine own, my Tennessee."

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Do you not think the above words by Robert L. Jarmon quite beautiful? I am sure the Tennessee sisters think so. I often wonder why there are so few letters from this state. We Tennesseans extend and like to receive a warm welcome, so perhaps other sisters like myself, are afraid the Editor's door will be closed and not be opened when they knock. But I am going to put on a brave front and push forward, hoping others will do likewise.

Yesterday while looking through some back numbers of COMFORT, I read a letter from Motherless Girl that I had failed to notice before. I am afraid I am not really competent to advise anyone but I wish very much to say a few words to this dear girl who has such a desire to accomplish so much good in the world and who cannot tell whether she loves a man well enough to marry him or not. Then listen, Motherless Girl. Never, never marry any man until you know, for if you really truly love you will surely know it. "True love is a force so great, so sweet, we cannot help but feel it. To us it is what the sunshine is to the flower, what the compass is to the vessel; it stimulates us to action, it sharpens the senses and refreshes the soul." This is only a part of John S. Rosa's beautiful reply to the question, What is love? If you have never read this before I believe it will help you to understand. But again, there are women married to men who never show them any affection, consideration or tenderness, but whose love endures to the end in spite of starvation and neglect. Suppose this home-loving man you speak of should love his home better than his wife? Suppose you marry him and have children of your own and after a few years awake to the horrible reality that he married you only that he might have someone to "mend his frock and bake his bread." Men are selfish creatures, dear, that is, most of them are, and think only of themselves and they expect a woman to go steadily on and never falter or complain. They either do not think or care anything about the trials and heartaches their wives may have. They always have something more important on their minds, the fishing trip for tomorrow or something of that sort. Suppose you should bring children into the world and after a short time pass into Eternity, leaving behind the babes, for which you gave your life, to fall into the hands of a stepmother who might not be kind to them. Then where would be the good that you had so painfully accomplished? There are already too many orphans that must fight the bitter fight alone. Marriage is a leap "Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

M. AND C. B., Bay City, Mich.—You need not discard the ring of your dead fiance. It is permissible for you to wear it on some other finger than the engagement one. (2) It is expected that a girl has been introduced to a gentleman with whom she is dancing.

R. J., Hinton, Okla.—It would be perfectly proper for you to call upon the parents of this girl who is ill and for you to ask them concerning her condition. If they think best for you to see her, they will offer you the opportunity.

G. C. S., Cornstalk, W. Va.—The engagement ring is worn upon the third finger of the left hand. The index finger is always reckoned as the first and the place of the engagement symbol is thus next to the little finger.

BLACK, BLUE AND BROWN, St. Croix, Ind.—If the boy with whom you are "keeping company" was not at this entertainment, it was permissible for you to allow some other boy to escort you home. But you most certainly should not have kissed him—or any other boy. If you read this column you should know this. Your kisses must be signs of affection reserved for the man to whom you may become engaged. (2) If your partner holds you too tightly while dancing, simply tell him that you do not like to dance in that manner. (3) You should not sit outside your home for an hour with the young man who has taken you back from a dance.

A. B. C., Menomonie, Wis.—When the brother of the girl you were visiting took both his sister and you to the theater, it was a natural form of courtesy in an endeavor to make your stay enjoyable. No formal thanks are therefore necessary, although it would be pleasant for you to say, after the performance, how much you had enjoyed it. (2) No expression of thanks is needed after a visit to an ice cream parlor.

IGNORANT, Missouri.—You were indeed more than indiscreet to smoke a cigarette and we admire the young man who told you that you had acted wrongly. We think you would be justified in endeavoring to regain his good opinion by telling him that you were thoroughly ashamed of your foolish performance. May this be a lesson to you in exhibiting what the right sort of young men really think of certain actions on the part of young girls. As you are but sixteen, you have plenty of time to learn what is good sense and good form and what is merely silly and wicked. (2) You acted in exactly the right manner regarding the young man who pinched your arm.

TWO ALABAMA GIRLS, Verbena, Ala.—A man is supposed to be capable of holding his own hat—at the theater or any other place. However, there was nothing incorrect in your holding it if you wished. (2) In escorting a girl home, a man may assist by offering his arm if darkness or bad walking conditions causes difficulties. It is generally best to say good night at the door of your home. (3) A lady may offer her hand or not when meeting a man whom she knows. (4) Yes, we would regard 142 pounds as being even more than plump for a girl but five feet tall.

G. C., St. John, Wash.—A girl of fourteen or fifteen is but a schoolgirl and a child. She must not "go" with a boy, and cannot, with propriety, attend any dances or parties except those of her school friends. (2) It would be correct for the boy to rise and open the door for you to pass out. (3) Yes, you weigh too much for your age and height. Eat less and exercise more.

ANXIOUSLY WAITING, Detroit, Mich.—The reason your mother has "never said anything" about your corresponding with boys is probably because she has never thought that a girl not yet out of the eighth grade would be thinking of anything so foolish. We advise your "waiting anxiously" until you are through with high school before you neglect books for boys. Ask your mother what she really thinks about this.

WHITE ROSE, Harriman, Tenn.—A schoolgirl of sixteen should not be "keeping company" with anything but the books and lessons which can make her sensible and wise. (2) It is the custom that a man walking with a lady takes the side which is nearest to the curb or street—the principle being that he will thus be able to protect her from traffic, dust, etc. In following this form, you will see that he must sometimes walk on the right of the lady and sometimes on the left.

FIFTEEN-YEAR-OLD FAYE, Clovis, New Mex.—Most assuredly it is better for you to be considered "old fashioned" than for you to accept as friends the kind of girls who allow themselves to be kissed by every boy they meet.

WORRIED GIRLS, Hoolyan, Tex.—We cannot see how any girl with self-respect can bother her head thinking about one of the "off and on" suitors that you have described. The next time he appears in your vicinity, tell him that if he wants this other girl he must stick to her and that you have no use yourself for one of his slippery-hearted type. (2) It is to be expected and wished for that you should be intimate with the sister of the man you love, but this does not mean that you should "tell her everything." We think her brother might justly object to such overcandidness on your part.

PERPLEXED, Thomaston, Ga.—As, according to the laws of Georgia, you cannot marry more than one man, it will be best not to become engaged to more than one at once. This will also avoid various unpleasant affrays between the several Thomaston swains who may think they have valid claims to your affections. And after you are safely engaged to one—and one only—do not "go" with others. (2) A girl should accept nothing but the most simple gifts from a man to whom she is not engaged.

AN ANXIOUS GIRL, South Dakota.—A girl of fifteen may attend the "movies" with her brothers, if she goes and returns under their escort. She should not go, however, if her mother objects. (2) It was permissible for you to write simple, friendly letters of neighborhood news to a boy you knew who joined the Marine Corps.

Adventure of a Rhymer

It was a pitiful mistake, an error sad and grim. I waited for the railway train. It came at last, and from a car there stepped a dainty dame, and, looking up and down the place, she straight unto me came.

"Oh, Jack!" she cried. "Oh, dear old Jack!" and kissed me as she spake, then looked again and, frightened cried: "Oh, what a bad mistake!"

I said: "Forgive me, madam fair, for I am not your Jack, and as regards the kiss you gave, I'll straightway give it back."

And since that night I've often stood upon the platform dim, but only once in a man's whole life do such things come to him.—Pittsburg Chronicle Telegraph.

Effective Way to Beautify Face

The Use of Stuart's Calcium Wafers Is Recommended for its Wonderful Influence in Ridding Face of Pimples, Rash, Etc.

You need no veil, no mask, no lotions, creams or means to hide behind when your complexion shows that you have been using Stuart's Calcium Wafers. You are proud to be in the bright light. All those horrid pimples and blackheads, those liver splots and blotches, the rash and redness are gone and a more beautiful skin of fine texture has come to brighten your days. Pretty features are lost behind a repulsive skin. Get the blemish out of your skin with Stuart's Calcium Wafers. They contain the great wonder, calcium sulphide, one of the most searching and effective skin purifiers known.

You will find Stuart's Calcium Wafers on sale at any drug store, 50 cents a box. You will certainly be surprised and delighted with their successful action on the skin.

A Stubborn Cough Loosens Right Up

This home-made remedy is a wonder for quick results. Easily and cheaply made.

Here is a home-made syrup which millions of people have found to be the most dependable means of breaking up stubborn coughs. It is cheap and simple, but very prompt in action. Under its healing, soothing influence, chest soreness goes, phlegm loosens, breathing becomes easier, tickling in the throat stops and you get a good night's restful sleep. The usual throat and chest colds are conquered by it in 24 hours or less. Nothing better for bronchitis, hoarseness, croup, throat tickle, bronchial asthma or winter coughs.

To make this splendid cough syrup, pour 2½ ounces of Pinex into a pint bottle and fill the bottle with plain granulated sugar syrup and shake throughly. If you prefer, use clarified molasses, honey, or corn syrup, instead of sugar syrup. Either way, you get a full pint—a family supply—of much better cough syrup than you could buy ready-made for three times the money. Keeps perfectly and children love its pleasant taste.

Pinex is a special and highly concentrated compound of genuine Norway pine extract, known the world over for its prompt healing effect upon the membranes.

To avoid disappointment ask your druggist for "2½ ounces of Pinex" with full directions, and don't accept anything else. Guaranteed to give absolute satisfaction or money promptly refunded. The Pinex Co., Ft. Wayne, Ind.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

J. C. P., South Dakota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the property you mention belongs to the father of your deceased wife, you have no interest whatever in same; it would have been necessary for your wife to survive her father before acquiring an intestacy interest in his property.

MRS. L. D., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the relatives of the deceased wife, of the wealthy man you mention, will have no interest in his estate unless some provision is made for them by will.

MRS. J. I. E., Ohio.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that your husband has no interest in your separate real property, except that if he survives you he cannot be barred from a life estate in one third of same, but during your lifetime it is not subject to his debts nor does he have any interest in it. We think a will made by a man of unsound mind could be upset by a contest of same, provided, of course, his mind was affected at the time of the making of the will. We think that real estate held under a deed to the husband and wife as tenants by the entirety, upon the death of one becomes the sole property of the survivor.

MRS. M. E. B., Alabama.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the property you mention stood in your mother's name and she died without a will, your father would be entitled to a life estate in the real property and one half of the personal property absolutely, the balance of her estate going to her children in equal shares, the descendants of any deceased child taking the parent's share; we think your father, during his lifetime, can let your brother use such of the real estate as he may see fit.

E. M. S., Iowa.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that, upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child or descendant, the whole of his estate to the amount of seven thousand, five hundred dollars ($7,500.00), after the payment of debts and expenses of administration, and one half of all the estate in excess of said amount, shall go to the surviving widow, and the other half of said excess shall go to his parents.

E. A. W., Florida.—If your fiance refuses to carry out his promise to marry you, without any just reason for such refusal, we think you can recover such damages from him as you have suffered by reason thereof, in the proper action brought for that purpose; we do not think it necessary for you to wait until he has married some one else.

MISS E. E., Wisconsin.—The marriage laws of the states you mention differ in some respects; we think the consent of the parents is necessary to the marriage of males under 21 years of age in Missouri, Iowa, Illinois, Alabama and Wisconsin; we do not think there is any statutory limitation as to age, with the parents' consent, in Missouri; in Alabama we think it is 17 years, and we think it is 18 years in Illinois and Wisconsin, and 16 years in Iowa; as to females, without parents' consent, we think it is eighteen years in Alabama, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri and Wisconsin, with parents' consent, no statutory limitation in Missouri, 14 years in Alabama, 16 years in Illinois, 14 years in Iowa, and 15 years in Wisconsin. Marriage licenses are required in all these states.

MRS. M. D. O'S., Ohio.—Under the laws of Illinois, we are of the opinion that upon the death of your father, leaving no will, his widow would receive certain allowances of household goods and one third of the balance of the personal property, absolutely, and dower of a one third interest for life in his real estate, the balance going in equal shares to his children, the descendants of any deceased child taking the parent's share.

A. N., Connecticut.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no will, if married since April 20, 1877, her husband would receive one third of her estate, both real and personal, absolutely, the balance going in equal shares to her children.

MISS E. C. R., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that where an inheritance passes by intestacy to the collateral kindred of an intestate, if part of such collateral relatives be of the whole blood and the other part of the half blood only, of the intestate, those of the half blood shall inherit only half so much as those of the whole blood, but if all be of the half blood, they shall have whole portions.

J. P. B., Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that in case of the separation of the parents, the custody of the children is in the discretion of the court, taking in consideration the best interest of the children in making the award.

MRS. L. B. T., New Mexico.—Under the laws of Texas, we are of the opinion that, upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow and children, the widow would receive, from his separate property, one third of the personal estate, absolutely, and a life estate in one third of his separate real estate, the balance going in equal shares to his children, regardless of whether they were the children of the surviving widow or by a former marriage. Community rights between husband and wife exist in Texas as to property purchased or acquired by onerous title during marriage and such property, upon the death of either the husband or wife, is subject to a different method of division than the manner set forth above, which applies only to the separate property of the husband.

H. P. S., Montana.—We can form no opinion as to the rights of the parties under the contract, a part of which you submit, without an examination of a complete copy of the contract and full particulars as to all of the facts in connection therewith; if however, the contract provides, without qualification, for the purchase of the property mentioned at a stated sum payable in installments, we think the seller can, at his option, bring suit against the purchaser for the recovery of the amount of any overdue installment payments and interest, and upon recovery of judgment against the purchaser, enforce payment of same from any property the purchaser may own, not exempt by law, from levy under execution, instead of enforcing any forfeiture rights provided by later clauses in the contract.

MRS. C. L., North Dakota.—Upon your statements, we think you would be very foolish to transfer any interest in your property to your new husband. We think you should notify the Creamery Co. to pay your cream checks direct to yourself and deposit same in the bank in your own name; we see no reason why you should turn your property over to your husband, and receive from him only such small sums as he sees fit to give you.

MRS. E. C. R., Connecticut.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that, upon your death without a will, the children of your deceased half-sister would have rights to your property, prior to the rights of your cousins.

W. G., California.—If your debtor refuses to pay you the amount of your claim against him, we think you should bring action against him to enforce the payment of same.

MRS. G. G., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that in case of the separation of the parents, the custody of the children becomes a question for the court to decide after taking evidence as to what would be for the best interest for the children; we think that if you are compelled to leave your husband, on account of his refusal to provide for yourself and child, you should take your own property with you.

Comfort's League of Cousins

flage, are becoming more and more rare. Heaven knows I want the young people to have a good time and enjoy the fleeting days of golden youth which, alas, pass so soon away, but it is in youth that character, personality, honor, truth and goodness, the foundations which make for personal happiness and national greatness, are laid. As the twig is bent so the tree will grow. Disregard of the Sabbath, and Saturday night dances with discordant jazz music, wild hilarious joy rides and a Sunday morning headache, mean bending the twig of youth in the wrong direction and though not all who drink deep of the cup of pleasure and indulgence and who open the floodgates of their wildest emotions, and who, at public dances, accept the attentions and make the acquaintance of men of whose character and reputation they know nothing and who too often are libertines—lounge lizards we call them in the city, hunting for prey—are contaminated by mixing in at these free-and-easy affairs, too many, alas, are deprived of the bloom of modesty and sweetness and take risks and chances which too often lead them far on the road to destruction. The war has upset the world's mental equilibrium, if it ever had one. Sober living and sober thinking have gone by the board. It is a jazz world full of discordant sounds, greedy, grasping hands, intolerant, selfish, and in big spots barbarous, cruel and ruthless. The world war gave us a chance to gather a wonderful harvest, but we are trampling on the golden grain of opportunity or tearing it up by the roots and sowing the seeds of lust, selfishness and hatred, greed and stupidity, and bringing to naught all our sacrifice, effort and endeavor. Yes, my dear, it is the truth that hurts and I've enough of it on hand to make trouble makers and traitors run into their holes like whipped dogs. Of course this is a punk country and Uncle Sam is no good, but I notice all the foreigners that are rushing to Europe by the thousands have an average of three thousand dollars tucked away in their jeans. One Greek shoeblack had twenty-five thousand dollars, a goodly part of it in gold, sewed into his clothing and tucked around his body in leather belts. Whole streets of Eastern Europe have been built up by U. S. money. Of course none of these emigrants are coming back, but wait until the money begins to run low and you'll see them all headed for this vile old United States to get another haul. Here's my love to you, Alice, and God bless you.

NEW ALBANY, 2306 Shelby St., IND.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Two of my friends wrote to you and they got so many nice letters and cards that I thought I would write and see if someone would not write to me. I would answer all I could. Uncle, do you or any of your nieces or nephews know a remedy for stubbornness? I am so stubborn I would not do anything anybody wants me to. I can play the violin and knit and make fancy work and as we have chickens I can and have to feed them. I am four feet nine inches tall and weigh ninety-seven pounds. Have light brown hair and blue eyes, fair complexion and rosy cheeks. I hope the people who read COMFORT will write to me.

JULIA ASHABRANNER.

So, Julia, you want me to prescribe a cure for stubbornness. Now if you were seven feet tall and weighed three hundred pounds, it might be difficult to handle your case, but a young lady of your diminutive proportions ought to be easily handled. I take it for granted that moral suasion, that lectures and wheedling and coddling have all been used in your case and used in vain. I also take it for granted (that is, unless you have no parents or your parents lack moral fiber and determination and love their little baby girlie so much that they are afraid to hurt her) that you have already come in contact with the big stick. If you haven't, that is evidently what you are in need of. Billy the Goat is sharpening his horns and says if you will pay carfare he will come to New Albany and will guarantee a perfect cure in five minutes. As a matter of fact, the cure for you, my dear, lies within and not without. You have let the bad that is within your nature conquer the good. Instead of being a nice, sweet, lovable little girlie—pliable, dutiful, considerate and kind, you are trying to give a first-class imitation of a mule. As Haliburton says, "Mules and human jackasses are proverbially stubborn." The stubbornness that upholds righteousness, that fights to the death against wrong, that battles for a principle, is a glorious virtue, but, alas, generally men and little girls are stubborn just in proportion as they are ignorant, wrong, self-willed, stupid and mulish. Yours is a case in which a little Christian Science would do a whole lot of good. You might repeat to yourself a hundred times every day, "I want to be lovable, kind, thoughtful, considerate, helpful and do what my parents tell me, for I know they love me and would not tell me to do anything that was not for their benefit and my own." We are interested to know that you can as well as feed chickens. There ought to be a lot of money in the chicken canning industry. It takes quite a lot of money to feed chickens these days. A friend of mine took a chicken to a swell restaurant in New York and she got hungry and had to be fed and it cost just eleven dollars to feed that chicken. If it cost as much as that to feed all the chickens they would soon go into the can and stay there. Now, Julia, just remember that there was a stubborn gentleman over in Europe, Kaiser Wilhelm sawwood Hohenzollern. His stubbornness has sent millions to their graves and blasted the lives of untold millions more, and has practically plunged the world in universal chaos and ruin. Now don't you do what he did or you'll be liable to get what he is going to get. He is going to find himself one of these days a canned rooster and I think I know a young lady who is going to be a canned chicken if she does not look out and quit being stubborn.

FORT SCOTT, East Wall St., KANS.

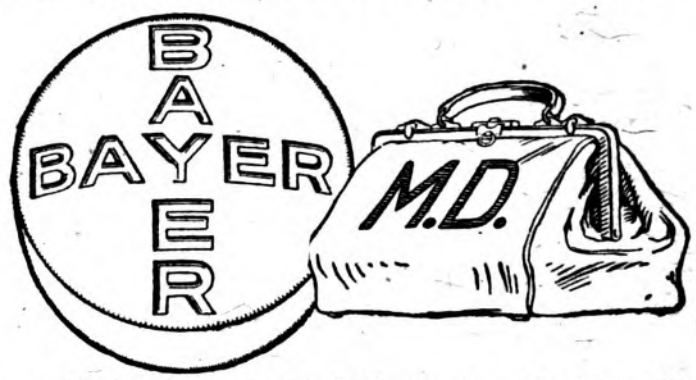
DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am writing to you for help. I want you to please print this letter for me. I am advertising for a husband. I have not got any home and would like to settle down with some good man with a good disposition between 23 and 35 years of age. I am 21 years old have dark hair, blue eyes, fair complexion, am 4 ft. 11 in. tall and weigh 100 pounds. I have talents for singing. I have a fair education, am a graduate from the graded school and would make a good wife. I am also a good cook. Now, Uncle Charlie, do you think this is a good world to live in? It seems dark to me sometimes, but I have tried to be as cheerful as I can. Now please do not throw this in the waste-basket. HELEN ————.

Helen, nothing would please me better than to bring all the lonely girls and still more lonely fellows together and start them on the path of matrimonial happiness; but matrimony is a lottery, a great gamble. I might pick you a winner, and again I might not; and if, after a few months' experience, you found that marriage was not all it is cracked up to be and that your male ideal, who had every movie idol backed off the screen, turned out on closer acquaintance to be just an ordinary hunk of human clay, who made a noise like a cyclone when he ate his soup, who wiped his mustache on the tablecloth, thought more of his pipe, his dog and his horse than of you; went to bed with his shoes on and only took a bath when he was caught outdoors in a thunder shower, you would sue me for damages and try to remove the one hair I possess. It is rather risky, too, to make a match for a young lady who has vocal ability. Nothing will break up a family quicker than a man who cares only for ragtime and a wife whose musical tastes run solely to gospel hymns or grand uproar. I want to congratulate you on being a good cook, but I've heard so many people say that they were good cooks, only to discover later on, alas, that they knew no more about cooking than a Milwaukee socialist knows about patriotism, or a Bolshevik knows about soap. When I had the audacity to take one of these grub spoilers to task one day she said that anyone would know she was a good cook as she always went to church on Sunday. In the musical line the only thing that makes a hit with the average man is a steak sizzling in the pan, the kettle warbling its cheerful song and the pleasant rattle of the knives and forks as they are arranged on the table. If you want to escape the divorce courts, however, and live a cheerful married life, get a Maxim silencer or sit on the baby every time it gives an imitation of Caruso with the colic, especially if it starts in just as hubby has settled down for his second beauty sleep. When you ask for a man with a good disposition between the ages of 23 and 35, which is 12 long years, you are looking for the impossible. If you can find a man who can boast of having a good disposition after he has been married for two minutes, let alone 12 years, you are a lucky girl. Don't get lonely, Helen, and don't advertise for a husband. It is a dangerous business as you would realize if you were to read of the terrible things that frequently happen to those who are lured to their doom by matrimonial sharks, some of whom have private burial grounds. Be patient and Mr. Right will come along, and as you are 4 ft. 11 in., he will probably be 6 ft. 6 in. tall, and he will look like a quarter to twelve every time he stoops to kiss you. If he does not behave himself we will buy you an airship so you can go up into the clouds when he is a naughty boy and get busy with his wool. You ask if this is a good world to live in. I've tried several worlds, Helen, and this is the best I've found so far. Don't kick if the world is dark, as a dark world is an excellent place to spoon in, and if there was no spooning there would be no wedding bells.

PHARSALIA, N. Y.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:



I an a girl twelve years old, four feet eleven inches tall. I have dark brown hair and grey eyes. I live on a farm of 240 acres. We have twenty-nine cows, three horses and two colts the names of one of which is Nigger and the other is Colonel. We have twelve hens and forty-two little chickens. We have som plum trees and som apple trees. I have three sisters. One is older than me and the other two are younger. This is the first time I have wrote. MYRTLE HOLCOMB.

Myrtle, you may be an excellent farmerette and doubtless are, but if you were to take part in a spelling bee I think you would be badly stung, and if you ever boarded the good ship Penmanship, I'm afraid both you and it would soon be at the bottom of the ocean. You say, moisture must be put back into it, otherwise the silage will mold and will not keep.

The Modern Farmer

A device is fixed so that a small stream of water runs onto the silage when it is cut and is carried up into the silo with it. Since the moisture dried out of the corn is about half its weight, an amount of water nearly equal to the corn in weight should be added. This is the mistake most people make in making silage from dry corn. They do not add enough water. There is little danger of adding too much.

Coating Silo Interiors

Those who have built concrete silos, of the solid or block styles, will have noticed that silage juice sometimes seeps through the walls and shows upon the outside. That saturation of walls with juice has been found injurious in the long run and should be prevented, so far as that proves possible.

Owners dread the painting of a silo interior as scaffolding has to be built to make the work safe. This fear need no longer keep them from the work, for a simple plan is now in vogue. It is to postpone the coating act until the silo is being filled; then the silage can be used instead of a scaffold, the operator using the whitewash brush as high as he can reach in advance of the filling process. In this way the work progresses gradually as the silo is filled and is completed when the top is reached.

It has been usual to use for such work a thin wash of lime and cement and to put it on with a whitewash brush, or spray pump with suitable nozzle. A new plan and one that strikes us as a good one is to use melted paraffin for the purpose. One man reports that he has tried this and has found it perfectly satisfactory. The coating of paraffin is said to be durable so that it shows no damage after a season in place, other than scratches from the pitchforks used in spreading the silage.

It certainly is well to keep the inside of a silo clean and smooth and a coating that will seal it against saturation with silage juice also protects the cement and makes it last longer. It also makes freezing a little less likely to injure the silage.

Quarantine New Bought Animals

Several times we have given this good advice and we want to repeat it and make it more impressive, for we find that it is not being heeded as generally as it deserves. It is an absolutely necessary precaution if farm animals are to be kept free from dangerous diseases.

To clinch what we have said, it may be reported that recently a man took some hogs to a fair, won prizes with them and on return home turned the show animals in with his home herd. The result was that he infected the entire herd with cholera and although vaccinating and isolation was instantly tried it was too late to save some of the animals and the loss exceeded $1,000. Two dairymen bought a cow apiece at an auction sale and turned them in with the home cattle, despite advice to the contrary, with the result that inside of four days all of the cattle came down with "pink eye" and the loss was severe from shrink in milk flow. These cattle might easily have been detected as affected at the time of purchase, for they had ulcerated eyeballs. They had passed the acute stage of the disease but still were able to transmit it to other cattle. The ulcerated condition often ends in perforation of the cornea (front chamber of the eye) and permanent blindness. The disease, however, is easily remedied if taken in time, the treatment consisting in isolation in a darkened stable, the placing of a pea-sized bit of one per cent yellow oxide of mercury ointment between the eyelids and then massaging to get it over the eyeballs. The treatment is repeated daily if found necessary.

In the same way new-bought cows carry tuberculosis or contagious infection of the infective form of udder disease into a herd, unless quarantined and proved to be sound and healthy before being allowed to associate with the home cattle. Stockers and feeders bought in the big city markets and shipped in cars that too often are inadequately disinfected and whitewashed, or possibly untreated in that respect, often bring in fatal hemorrhagic septicemia, and sheep carry scab. Evidently, then, it is a wise precaution to quarantine all new-bought animals until fit to mix with the home stock.

Molasses for Stock Feeding

It would be well for every reader of COMFORT who lives in a state or district where sugar cane (black-strap) molasses is readily available, to price this useful article of nutrition and employ it freely this winter in the maintenance of animals if the price is not prohibitive.

Black-strap is a splendid plumper of thin horses. For that purpose it was first largely used in Porto-Rico at the time of the Spanish-American war. Cavalry and artillery horses and those of the transport service often became galled and thin. This required their retirement from work, and as sugar-cane molasses was plentiful and cheap it was tried as a quickly assimilable feed and worked wonders in restoring the run-down beasts to service. So remarkable was its plumping and polishing effects that it is reported that the previous drivers of the horses failed to recognize them when sent back to work in fine condition.

One quart of molasses stirred up with three quarts of hot water and fed night and morning mixed with cut hay, wheat bran and cornmeal, will suffice for the plumping of a thin horse, whole oats being fed at noon and long hay at night. Much more than that can be fed without causing colic scours. On the sugar plantations molasses is a favorite and valued feed for work mules and horses and gives fine satisfaction.

Molasses also may be fed with advantage to cattle. Use it to make palatable hay and straw that otherwise might not be relished, and it may also form a part of the dairy cow's ration, is an adjunct to mashes of mixed meals, or to incorporate with cut hay, straw or corn stover. It is best to start in lightly with molasses until the animals take to it with relish, and at first it may be necessary to starve a horse to eat molassed feed. Soon, however, it is taken with relish and the good effect quickly appears. Every bit of feed should be carefully handled this winter, so dear is it in the market and so scarce in some districts of the country. Molasses utilized as we have suggested will make it possible to lessen the daily ration of dearer feed and to make feed of poor quality palatable and nutritious.

Questions and Answers

PEACH ROT AND PEAR TREE BLIGHT.—Please give me some idea of what to do to prevent the rotting of my peaches. The tree looks healthy but the fruit rots before ripening. My pear trees have the blight. Do you know of any way to prevent it?

MRS. A. M. E., Chase City, Va.

A.—Fire blight in pears cannot be cured. The only remedy is to cut and burn affected branches. Peach rot can be controlled by use of Bordeaux spray if taken in time. Advise you to send samples of decayed fruit and blighted branches with a full description of same to your Agricultural College at Blacksburg, Virginia. Doubtless they can help you much.

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

Heaves or Broken Wind

THE disease known as heaves or broken wind, technically as emphysema of the lungs, generally is caused during the winter months. Then the work horse is given more coarse, dry, bulky feed than during summer, when grass is available and beneficial on account of its laxative properties. Distension of the digestive organs with bulky feed, and working the horse when so distended are the common causes of heaves. Dusty hay, weathered corn stover and threshed timothy or clover, are most likely to induce the disease, and there can be no question that horses born with a gluttonous appetite are especially susceptible to the ailment.

Heaves starts in the stomach. Chronic indigestion is caused by overeating, bolting of feed or imperfect mastication, and it is indicated by expulsion of gas during spells of coughing. The pneumogastric nerve of the stomach becomes affected, and its branch to the lungs soon suffers in the same way. Then the walls of myriads of tiny air cells or chambers of the lungs break down, and thus weakened are unable to perfectly expel air. This necessitates the help of the abdominal muscles, and so one notices a double, bellows-like action at the flanks, as the affected horse expels air.

No medicine possibly can restore the normal condition of the lungs. Broken-down cell walls cannot be rebuilt. Heaves, therefore, is incurable when established. Prevention is of paramount importance. Palliative treatment, however, is possible when a horse becomes affected.

To prevent heaves, work or exercise a horse every day; keep the bowels active; give no bulky feed at noon when the animal has to work hard, and do not work him when distended with hay. Avoid dusty roughage of any kind, and any feed that is damaged or moldy.

Treat heaves by wetting all feed, preferably with limewater, feeding oat straw or oat sheaves in winter and grass in summer in preference to hay; adding roots or a little silage or bran to regulate the bowels, and never working the horse immediately after a full meal. If medicine is necessary, after such management has been practiced for some time, give half an ounce of Fowler's solution of arsenic night and morning until the distress is relieved; then gradually discontinue the medicine, taking at least two days to the process.

DIABETES.—I bought a mule late in the spring and he appeared perfectly sound. About a month ago his kidneys began to act too freely. The urine is clear. He has urinated as many as nineteen times in one day. It doesn't seem to hurt him, only he is falling off in flesh. I feed him oats and sweet mixed mule feed and for a week have been giving him green corn tops and some green grass. He does not go in the pasture and has done very little work for nearly two months.

A.—Moldy or otherwise damaged hay or grain is the common cause of this form of diabetes. Stop giving such feed and substitute sound feed, or turn the mule out on grass. He should work or take exercise every day. Twice daily mix a teaspoonful of dried sulphate of iron in the feed. If that does not suffice, give two teaspoonfuls of syrup of iodide of iron in water three times a day and increase the dose as found necessary.

CHARCOAL FOR SOWS.—I am told not to feed a breeding sow any wood charcoal. Is there any harm in it? I have taken COMFORT for years and could not be without it. M. H.

A.—Not only is there no harm in it but it is highly beneficial as a corrective of acidity and tendency to indigestion. Also allow free access to wood ashes and slaked lime and let her have alfalfa or clover hay in addition to other feed.

DARK URINE.—I am anxious to know a treatment for my cow that has freshened three times. Her urine is always of a dark color and it has not been clear for a long time. What is the cause and what treatment will cure her? MRS. I. N.

A.—Congestion of the kidneys may be the cause; but we sometimes see such urine when a cow is eating irritating feed, especially when on a wild pasture or in wood land. Damaged feed also may be a cause. Try to give sound feed that does not contain irritants. Give her a handful of glauber salts in water two or three times a week until her bowels respond freely.

GARGET.—I have a cow and her calf is over a year old. In milking her I found one of the teats was swollen. It looked as though it had been bitten or stung by something. About once every month the milk from that teat is clotted and stringy. It lasts one day. M. P.

A.—At times of attack, milk clean every two hours, massaging the udder well each time. and at night rub in thoroughly a mixture of one part each of turpentine and fluid extract of poke root and belladonna and eight parts of lard or sweet oil. Give internally, in feed or drinking water night and morning, a tablespoonful each of powdered saltpeter and poke root until the milk becomes normal.

CRIBBING.—I have a horse, three years old, which has recently formed the habit of cribbing. I have tried tying straps around the neck. Is there a remedy to stop the habit? D. B.

A.—When not eating feed, keep a small rope or cord tied in place as follows: Tie one end to the ring on one side of the halter then pass the free end under the upper lip, pull fairly tight and tie to the other ring. This sometimes stops cribbing and windsucking; but the vice is incurable when confirmed. Also keep the colt in a box-stall containing nothing upon which the teeth can be set or the chin rested to practice the habit.

INDIGESTION.—Will you tell me what is wrong with my calf. He was getting along fine until he was three months old, then he became poor and his hair seemed to stand on end. He eats good and hearty but has no life. I still feed him milk and he has a good pasture. He doesn't grow any and now is five months old. MRS. M. M.

A.—Keep the calf off grass and allow it a large, clean, well ventilated pen in the stable and exercise in a shaded yard. Give it a physic of castor oil in milk and then let it help itself to whole oats, wheat bran and flaxseed meal from a self-feeder. Continue to feed milk two or three times a day, also clover or alfalfa hay. If its stomach is not blocked with hairballs, it should improve if so treated.

WORMS IN LAMBS.—My lambs are swollen under the lower jaw and the mouth and head of each is feverish. Their eyes turn white, they become stupid, lie around and grit their jaws. The older sheep have never taken it and appear to do fine. Nearly all the lambs that have been affected have died. L. E. L.

A.—Stomach worms are sapping the blood of these lambs as you would learn by making a post-mortem examination. After withholding feed and water for 24 hours, unless in case of a weak lamb, give a dose of solution of sulphate of copper (bluestone) by means of a syringe or nozzle, rubber tube and glass funnel. Make the solution by dissolving one ounce of finely powdered pure sulphate of copper in two quarts of hot water. The dose is three fourths ounce for a lamb, one ounce for a yearling, two for a two-year-old, and three for an adult sheep. Withhold drinking water for at least six hours after dosing. Repeat the dose at intervals of ten days until two or three doses have been given. Feed generously on crushed oats, wheat bran, oilmeal and best of clover or alfalfa hay. Green stuff or roots or silage also would be helpful. Good feeding is imperative if the remaining lambs are to be saved.

SCRATCHES.—I have a horse seven years old and in good condition. In the winter he has sores come from his fetlocks down to the edge of the hoof and then he tears the flesh apart. In the spring when the weather gets warm and the ground dry, the sores heal and give no trouble until cold weather. What will prevent them from becoming sore? M. C. S.

A.—Do not wash the legs from November to May and dry them thoroughly any time they become wet, rubbing in fine sawdust to complete the drying. Also be careful not to let the horse stand in a cold draft in the stable or elsewhere when the legs are wet. Twice daily apply freely a mixture of two ounces of flowers of sulphur, and one dram each of spirits of camphor and compound tincture of benzoin to the ounce of fresh lard or vaseline.

SEROUS ABSCESS.—I have a six-year-old mare. Every year about the last of August she has large lumps on her, having one now on her hip as large as a half-gallon bucket and it seems to be full of water. G. C. M.

A.—Bruising or a kick probably has caused these serous cysts, but you should try to determine and remove the cause. After clipping off the hair, open the sac at its lowest part, liberate the serum and with the cleansed finger break down adhesions and remove clots of blood or fibrin possibly present. Then inject tincture of iodine and hold it in for a few minutes, rubbing to bring it into contact with the interior of the sac. Then pack in oakum that has been saturated with equal quantities of turpentine and raw linseed oil and leave a tag of the oakum hanging out of the wound to serve as a drain. Apply lard or vaseline freely to the sound skin under the opening. Renew the packing daily until it no longer can be inserted.

RUPTURE: POLL-EVIL.—My horse was hurt while in the pasture. He was cut about six inches from the flank. I washed it with a carbolic acid wash and it healed leaving a soft lump and is getting larger. What can I do for it? (2) I have a horse that has poll-evil. It has run and healed up. When I work him on a heavy load it will swell up again. Can you give a cure? H. W.

A.—We suspect that a rupture is present. If so, you will find it possible to work the bowel back into the abdominal cavity by manipulating with the fingers. An operation by a surgeon may be necessary; meanwhile, work the bowel back, cover the place with strips and patches of porous plaster or surgeons' tape or plaster; put on layer above layer to make a thick covering. Then pass a wide bandage around the body, crossing the truss of plaster and stuck to it by means of common pitch or melted Burgundy pitch. (2) Home treatment will not avail in a case of poll-evil as an operation is necessary, so you should take the horse to a qualified surgeon for that purpose. Meanwhile, inject a little tincture of iodine every other day and on other days inject a two per cent solution of permanganate of potash.

ABSCESS.—Please tell me something about my cow. Her calf came April 8th and we had used her milk a day or two the last of April. She came up one night with a large lump on her right side near where her hip joint works. When you sit down to milk her the place is even with your eyes. When it was first done it had a little piece of hide and hair taken off and on each side of that it looked like four pin points that had been stuck in and then drawn out. I lanced it and a milkish pus came out and in a week it began to bleed. It is about like a large cocoanut and a little bit hard. I thought she might be snake bit. MISS M. T.

A.—Horning by another cow would be the likeliest cause of such a bruise and abscess. Paint the part with tincture of iodine once daily and again open it if a soft place forms. If you open it, inject a little of the tincture every other day and it should soon heal. It is possible, of course, that a snake bite was the cause, but horning is more common.

ABNORMAL MILK.—Please tell me what to do for my cow. She was fresh in May and gives between three and four gallons of milk a day. Her milk seems all right until it sours, then there is water between the cream and clabber, so we make but very little butter. We made lots of it before the milk went wrong. She is a fine cow, in good condition, and ranges on a good pasture of grass. Mrs. R. G. S., see answer to M. P.

ABNORMAL MILK.—I have a fine milk cow that appears to be in good condition. Her milk curdles when it is boiled. The fresh-sweet milk will curdle and leave a thin whey. She has a green pasture of Sudan grass and is given no dry feed. What would you prescribe? M. P.

A.—The cow may not be to blame as bacteria in the milk utensils often cause such conditions of the milk or cream. Set a sample of milk from each quarter of the udder in a separate vessel that has been scalded. In that way you will be able to determine if any quarter is giving abnormal milk or if all are equally affected. Meanwhile, scald, cleanse and sun dry the milk vessels more perfectly, set them in a new, clean, dustless place and see that the wash water is clean. Write again if necessary after these things have been done and you have tested the milk.

Mother: Keep a jar of Musterole handy

Sometimes, in the night, Pain comes to your house. Then is the time, most of all, when you rely on good old Musterole. No fuss, no bother, no worry—no messing about with plasters or waiting for water to heat.

Quickly you go to the Musterole jar. A bit of that clean white ointment on little Bobbie's chest, and lightly you rub it in. A gentle tingle of skin puts Doctor Nature to work, and soon a healing warmth reaches the conges ted spot. Then comes a soothing coolness, and Bobbie drowses off to sleep.

For coughs, congestions, bronchitis and croup, Musterole is uncommonly effective. It is good, too, to drive away the pains of rheumatism, lumbago and neuralgia.

Musterole relieves — without discomfort.

It is better than a mustard plaster, with all the virtues of the old-time plaster but none of its disadvantages.

Musterole does not blister. And it is easy to apply. Just rub it on. Rub it on—for little Bobbie's cold—for Sister's bronchitis—for Grandma's pains in chest or back. It's an old-fashioned remedy in a new-fashioned form.

Keep a jar handy.

Many doctors and nurses recommend Musterole. 30c and 60c jars. $2.50 hospital size.

L. L., Ogden, Utah.—Continual massage with cocoa butter should certainly help increase the size of your neck, as should also exercises taken by revolving the head about on the shoulders with a slow swinging motion, first to the right and then to the left. If you have tried these methods as you think without success, it is because you have looked for results too soon. Progress must necessarily be slow, and several months might have to elapse before you could notice any actual gain. Of course, if you are really thin, anything which would aid you to increase in weight would also help to add the desired flesh about your neck. How about ceasing to worry and starting in to drink several quarts of milk each day?

MRS. O. E., Michigan.—May 14, 1902, fell upon a Wednesday.

MRS. C. D. B., Idaho.—There is plenty of vacant public land in Oregon—the official figures in acreage up to July 1, 1918, being 13,369,819. There are also 955,772 acres which have not as yet been under government survey. The U. S. Land Offices in Oregon are seven in number, and are located at Burns, La Grande, Lakeview, Portland, Roseburg, The Dalles and Vale. Address the Register of any of these offices, asking for information and proper forms of application. Portland would be the most important of the offices listed.

MRS. W. H. B., Covington, Okla.—So-called "matrimonial papers" are, in our opinion, foolish and sometimes of harmful tendency. This department prefers to not furnish addresses of such periodicals to COMFORT readers.

MRS. E. S. M., Springfield, Mo.—There are 281,436 acres of public land yet vacant in the state of Arkansas. The three U. S. Land Offices are located at Camden, Harrison and Little Rock. Write to the Register in charge of any one of these offices for such information as you require.

MRS. V. D., Franklinsville, N. Y.—Dissolve a teaspoonful of powdered alum in a glass of warm water and try moistening thoroughly the kid uppers of your oxfords. Do not touch the soles. Place the shoes in a place where they will dry very slowly. The solution may slightly whiten or discolor the leather so that you may have to blacken the oxfords after the treatment. Vici kid is a light, pliable stock which stretches easily and for this reason the shoes may again increase in width. If they do, repeat the treatment or procure a pair of thin insoles to wear inside the shoes. Remember that all footwear is better too large than too small.

MRS. B. G. D., Fostoria, O.—If you do not wish to carry on the preparation and sale of this remedy yourself, it is evident that you must sell it. It is equally evident that you cannot sell a thing unless you let people know—and many people—that you have something for sale. We suggest that you place an advertisement regarding your formula in the columns of journals published in nearby Ohio cities. You can be sure that the answers you get from such advertising will be from interested inquirers.

E. C., Calla, O.—Although Edith is a name not much used in France, when it does become the baptismal property of a French infant the name is spelt in exactly the same manner as when used to christen anyone of Uncle Sam's female citizens.

A. W., Hector, Minn.—John Joseph Pershing, America's great general, was born in the town of Laclede, Linn County, Missouri, on Sept. 13, 1860. He is the son of John F. Pershing and Anna E. Thompson. He is thoroughly American both by birth and lineage. General Pershing's wife and three daughters lost their lives by fire in the burning of the Presidio on Aug. 27, 1915. He has one child remaining—a son, Warren.

L. M. S., Scottsville, Ky.—Try stretching your skirt tightly over a bowl or tub and then pour a steady stream of boiling water through the fruit stains. The water must be genuinely boiling.

A. C. K., Sanish, N. D., is asked by Mrs. B. W. Shalty, 609 Monroe St., Decatur, Indiana, to write to her regarding A. C. K.'s old platter.

in the dark so why not be a mother to one, or more if you like, of the thousands of motherless children, rather than run the risk of leaving more motherless children?

When you truly love, little girl, you will know it but you will not know if the man's love for you is as deep and true as yours is for him and therein lies the agony of a future life with a companion who isn't a companion. Understand I said "suppose" this should be so which is often the case.

Motherless Girl, I am anxious to know the decision you make. Let us hear from you again. Whatever it may be I hope you will find only the peace and happiness you deserve. May there be no thorns, no rough roads; may your life be ever bright, smooth and fair. Look to God for comfort and succor in anything you undertake and He will enable you to go steadily on through your paths of duty and will at last crown you all His Own.

Pearl Vesey writes very interesting letters and I enjoy them but I disagree with her on some things.

Just a few more words and I'll go. If Bachelor Bill persists in knocking our sex I think he should be denied the privilege of seeing his wonderful (?) letters in the Corner. How many agree with me? But, girls, let me tell you something, he is more to be trusted than the man who tries to make you think he would go down into purgatory for one smile from you. Don't put too much faith in any of them, especially those who try to make you think they are so noble and grand.

Best wishes for all, from your new friend,

UDEYNE.

Udeyne.—Turn about is fair play, and if the sisters are somewhat harsh in their criticism of the opposite sex then it is only fair that they should have a like privilege so Bachelor Bill and any of his friends are free to express themselves as they choose. Don't you think that is the only fair way?—Ed.

CHIMACUM, WASH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Since my letter appeared in May COMFORT I have received so many letters from COMFORT sisters from many States that it was out of the question for me to answer them all separately, so I beg leave to thank the writers through the medium of the Sisters' Corner.

Most of you ask me to tell more of this western country. Now if I were the wife of a real estate man I might enlarge upon the opportunities here, but as I am only a farmer's busy wife I can but say that this western Washington country is being developed so rapidly that soon the Easterner will feel right at home here except that he will never cease to marvel at our comfortable, even climate, where the same clothing may be worn the year around. No extremes of heat and cold. Overcoats are often needed in July, while men now and then work in shirt sleeves in January. Some of the sisters ask how old I am. If the weight of an opinion or an idea is to be determined by the age of the one expressing it, then it is amusing to note in many letters I have read in the Corner the advice given on caring for babies, how to raise the children and (most confident of all) how to navigate the sea of matrimony, and then at the close of the letter we read, "I am 23 years old and have been married five years." Girls, girls, put on the soft pedal. I've been married over twenty-and-five years, and have not yet found a set formula for any of these problems, and I don't feel wise enough to advise on any of these subjects. Ah! I hear someone whisper, "Wonder if she ever raised any children?". Yes, I have raised twin sons. They are now sixteen. However, there is one rule which I have set for myself and tried to live up to. That is "to do the duty which lies nearest me." This applies to my family, my friends and my work. After that I do my best and leave the rest.

Here are a few original short cuts for those who do their own work as I do.

Don't ruin the scissors by cutting rhubarb. Take together on the board as many stems as you can cover with one hand and with a long butcher knife slice them as you would a loaf of bread.

Pick and dress the chicken on thick newspaper, then roll up paper with the refuse and put it in the fire. Clean fish the same way.

Do a little baking every day except washday and your grub box will never be empty.

Can any of you tell me whether the tops of sweet

No More Wrinkles

BEAUTIFUL FIGURE

Superfluous Hair Vanishes Like Magic. Eyelashes Beautified

Pimples and Blackheads Removed Forever

Let this woman send you free, everything she agrees, and beautify your face and form quickly.

This clever woman has not a wrinkle upon her face; she has perfected a marvelous, simple method which brought a wonderful change in her face. For removing wrinkles, her method is truly wonderfully rapid.

She made herself the woman she is today and brought about the wonderful change in her appearance in a pleasant manner. Her complexion is as clear and fair as that of a child. She had thin, scrawny eye-lashes and eyebrows, which could scarcely be seen, and she made them long, thick and beautiful by her own methods and removed every blackhead and pimple from her face.

Nothing is taken into the stomach, no common massage, no harmful plasters, no worthless creams.

By her new process, she removes wrinkles and develops the whole figure plump and fat.

It is simply astonishing the hundreds of women who write in regarding the wonderful results from this new beauty treatment, which is beautifying their face and form after beauty doctors and other methods failed. She has thousands of letters on file like the following.

Mrs. M. L. B. Albin, Miss., writes: "I have used your beauty treatment with wonderful success. I have not a wrinkle on my face now and it is also improving my complexion, which has always troubled me with pimples and blackheads. My weight was 112 pounds before taking your treatment and now I weigh 117, a gain of 5 pounds. Your treatment is a God send to all thin women. I am so grateful you may even use my letter if you wish."

The valuable new beauty book which Madame Clare is sending free to thousands of women is certainly a blessing to women.

All our readers should write her at once and she will tell you absolutely free; about her various new beauty treatments and will show our readers:

How to remove wrinkles in 8 hours;
How to make long, thick eyelashes and eyebrows;
How to remove superfluous hair;
How to remove blackheads, pimples and freckles;
How to remove dark circles under the eyes;
How to quickly remove double chin;
How to build up sunken cheeks and add flesh to the body;
How to darken gray hair and stop hair falling;
How to stop forever perspiration odor.

Simply address your letter to Helen Clare, Suite A 179, 3311 Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill., and don't send any money, because particulars are free, as this charming woman is doing her utmost to benefit girls or women in need of information which will add to their beauty and make life sweeter and lovelier in every way.

CHINESE PUZZLE CLUB, 118 CAPPER BUILDING., TOPEKA, KANSAS

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MRS. A. B. R.—Warts in the vagina are best treated by the cautery, or snipped off with scissors and then cauterized. Consult your family doctor and have them treated in this way. Gargle your throat with ordinary salt and water—using one teaspoonful to the pint of hot water.

B. J. B., Garland, N. C.—The lumps in or near the tendons will probably have to be treated surgically; but you can try painting the lumps with tincture of iodine two or three times a week, and see what this treatment will do. For the neuralgia mentioned, take ten-grain capsules of sulphate of quinine three times a day during the attack, or just before, for two or three days. The neuralgia is undoubtedly of malarian origin.

MRS. R. K., Boyne City, Mich.—The redness of face is due to indigestion or, in some cases, to stimulants. The enlarged veins can be removed by the electric needle, which will destroy them. Attention to diet, keeping the bowels free, and drinking plenty of water will help cure the redness of skin. The use of small doses of thyroid extract might help the enlarged condition of the breast. This, however, should not be used except under the advice of your family doctor.

MISS X. Y. Z., Mt. Grove, Mo.—Your trouble is probably nervousness. Try assafœtida pills, containing about five grains, three times a day.

MRS. W. T. W., Quanah, Texas.—Use a lotion of sulphate of zinc to the eyes—strength of one half per cent. Drop in the eyes two drops, three times a day, after cleaning the eyes with a lotion of boric acid. Use the boric acid in strength of one teaspoonful to the pint of hot water.

MRS. C. T., Santa Anna, Cal.—Symptoms of Bright's disease are swelling of the eyelids and lower extremities, nausea, dyspepsia, pain in the back and finally loss of sight. The real test, however, is the examination of the urine by some expert pathologist. All of the above symptoms may be present and the kidneys not at fault.

MISS M. L. H., Aquilla, Texas.—Try five-grain doses, three times a day, of urotropin. If the urine is excessively acid this will help you. Drink also plenty of good soft water or vichy water.

MISS M. D., Cooperstown, N. Y.—Ichthyol ointment takes the soreness out of the bunion, and is curative if the cause of the bunion is removed.

MRS. E. M. A., Newcastle, Cal.—Have your hair shaved off, and apply to the scalp, twice a week, a resorcin lotion—eight grains to the ounce of alcohol and water.

MRS. W. J. H., Kenilworth, Utah.—If of malarial origin, large doses of quinine sulph—ten grains to the dose, will cure you.

MRS. D. H. J., Muskegon, Mich.—The operations may have had something to do with the sagging of the busts, and the dark rings under the eyes. You should take three-grain doses of ovarian extract, three times a day, after meals.

MISS F. K., Dover, Ky.—Forget your hydrophobia. There is no chance of having it at this day and date.

MISS M. H., Sharpsville, Ind.—For the oily nose use, at bedtime, an eight per cent salicylate of soda ointment. Apply only two or three times a week.

MISS M. D., Knoxville, Tenn.—You probably have a slow infection from your tonsils and, maybe, teeth. Have both attended to at once.

MISS L. E., May, Colo.—Your trouble is innate weakness. Take some good tonic, such as Basham's mixture, in tablespoonful doses, after meals. "Tone up" in this way and you will put on flesh, and be otherwise benefited.

MRS. P. B., Ralston, Okla.—The one best guess, in your case, is a decided change of climate. You seem to have a chronic pleurisy, and should do everything to avert consumption in a case such as you describe.

MRS. M. S., Tulsa, Okla.—Best way to reduce is to stop eating excessively of sweets and pastry, and all starchy foods. Epsom salts are used in pound doses in the bath. The bath must be hot, and the bath must be prolonged.

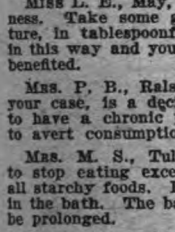
MRS. G. B. P., Ontario Center, N. Y.—If you have read COMFORT, you must have again and again read how to use skim milk for reducing weight. Use only one quart of the milk every other day, in divided doses—one glass in the morning, one at noon, one at four o'clock, and the last glass on retiring.

MISS M. H., Taloga, Okla.—You might try lunar caustic. Apply to the warts once or twice a week. If this does not remove them, have the actual cautery applied by your local doctor.

MRS. J. L. D., Betsey, Ky.—Try aromatic cascara sagrada, in teaspoonful doses, for your constipation. The thread worms can be removed by using an enema of salt and water. One teaspoonful to the pint of water. For the baby, give a half teaspoonful of milk of magnesia once a day, to correct the acidity of the stools.

MRS. I. B. B., LaBelle, Mo.—Have some good dentist look over and clean your teeth, fill any cavities in them. Have also your tonsils looked after, and any offending material removed. For the present condition of foul breath, gargle and wash your mouth with Dobell's solution, three or four times a day.

MRS. C. B., Springfield, Ky.—Try quinine sulph. pills, in three-grain doses, after meals. You, no doubt, have a pleurodynia and quinine should help you. You might also apply to the chest a large home-made mustard plaster, at night, enough to redden up the parts.



MRS. H. E. H., Grand Saline, Texas.—Try the skim-milk diet so often referred to in COMFORT, and repeated in this number. Try barley water for the baby, and leave off milk for two or three days.

MR. R. B. P., Chicago, Ill.—Your chewing remedy, or Fletcherizing, is all right. Continue it and advise others to do the same.

MRS. W. R., Jenkins, Minn.—There is a marked neurotic condition present in your case, and some simple remedy, as assafœtida pills of five-grain strength, may help, if not cure, you. The pills should be taken three times a day.

"You were ill, and I could not be at your side!" she whispered brokenly.

"Hush, my love!" he gently admonished. "So were you ill, and at the mercy of that villain, Berdyne, while I was powerless to come to your aid. I should have been wild had I known. Let us think of the future, sweetheart. Tomorrow you are to be mine—I arranged everything before I left San Francisco. I have a good friend in the city—a minister—and we will leave San Jose this afternoon and go directly to his house."

"Yesterday all was so dark," murmured Beryl, "and today everything is so bright and beautiful it seems as though it could not be true."

At that moment they heard the opening of a door, and the ranchman, a grizzled, weather-worn man of fifty, stepped out on the veranda.

"I beg your pardon," said he, abashed, as the lovers faced him hand in hand. "I thought I heard some one call me a spell ago."

He turned as though he would leave, but Beryl called to him:

"Please stay, Mr. Jackman! This is Mr. Preston, who has come to—to——"

"To take my little girl away from your hospitable home, Mr. Jackman," finished Neil, stepping forward and taking the rancher's hand.

Mr. Jackman seemed puzzled, and not at all at his ease.

"Glad to meet you, I'm sure," he returned. "The little one has been crying her eyes out on your account, Mr. Preston. She thought you had lost your life, up there in Alaska somewhere."

"It was all a mistake, Mr. Jackman; a mistake, however, in which this villain, Nicholas Berdyne, was intimately concerned."

"Berdyne?" repeated Jackman, with a nervous glance around him.

"He is a cur!" declared Neil warmly. "He came here under false pretences, and had laid his plans to wreck my little Beryl's happiness. He is not such a man, I assure you, as you would choose to have about your place."

"I—I must look into this," faltered Mr. Jackman. "Won't you come in, Mr. Preston? My wife has gone to a sick neighbor's for the day, but I will tell the Chinaman to do everything he can for you. Besides," he added, with a faint smile, "I think Beryl can be trustd to look after your comfort."

"I cannot remain very long this morning," Neil replied, "but I shall return this afternoon, and take Beryl away with me."

"We shall be sorry to have her go," said Mr. Jackman.

"I wish to thank you for your goodness to her. You have proved a true friend, and I hope I may have an opportunity to show that I am grateful."

Mr. Jackman excused himself, and Beryl and Neil wandered off along the woodland path that led toward Tonita's. When they reached the bowlder they seated themselves side by side, and talked lovingly of the past and of the future that was dawning with so much promise.

Neil, who had long believed that Beryl's father had left valuable property in the golden Northland, had undertaken the journey to the Yukon to investigate his affairs. He had learned much, pointing to a guilty meddling of Berdyne and his agents in Mr. Grayson's affairs.

"I am very sure, dear," said Neil, "that Berdyne has papers in his possession which will prove that he is holding for his own use a fortune that should go to you. But we will not discuss this matter until I can learn more. After tomorrow," he added passionately, placing an arm about her, and pressing his lips to hers, "I shall have the legal right to protect you, and to fight your battles. "Then," he added, determinedly, "let Berdyne look to himself. He is a master rogue, and I shall not spare him!"

"You learned a great deal from Irma Lee, did you not, sweetheart?" asked Beryl.

"She is a jealous woman, dearest, and kept nothing back in her talk with me. She told me how you had been befriended by Mr. Jackman and had left Denver to come to Sunset Ranch; and she likewise told me how Berdyne had intercepted my letters; how he was scheming to win you for his own; how he had hired the scoundrel Gorsline to go to you with the story that I was dead, and much more that was all in the nature of a terrible revelation. Hidden by an angle of the house, I overheard the most of what took place between you and Berdyne. I could not have had more convincing proof of your loyalty, my heart's own!"

"I had come to regard him as a noble and disinterested friend, Neil," said Beryl, with a shudder. "It was only when Irma Lee opened my eyes that I was able to look into his soul and see the blackness there."

"The rascal will have me to deal with hereafter," said Neil, "and he will find, I think, that I am more than a match for him."

The minutes flew by on golden wings, and an hour—one of the happiest hours of Beryl's life—had soon slipped away. Then Neil arose and lifted his sweetheart to his side.

"I am just as I came from the North, darling," said he, surveying his rough clothing with a rueful laugh, "but a trunk is following me from San Francisco and should be in San Jose this afternoon. I have quite a little to do, and so I must ride back to the town leaving you for a few hours in the hands of your good friend, Mr. Jackman. You will be ready when I come for you!"

"Ready and waiting," she answered, with a rare smile. "Oh, do not be long, my darling, for I shall count the minutes until you are back again."

With their arms about each other, they retraced the woodland path. When they drew near the ranch house they heard sounds of angry voices, and through the foliage of bush and tree they could see Berdyne, seated alone in his limousine, in front. Mr. Jackman was standing beside the road.

"Begone with you," cried Mr. Jackman, "and never let me see your face on my ranch again!"

"You will be sorry for this, my man," cried Berdyne, with well-assumed anger.

"You cannot come here and insult one of the members of my household. I am glad that I found you out before it was too late."

With a muttered exclamation, Berdyne pressed the electric starter, and was whirled away.

"And so, my darling," said Neil, gazing after the departing automobile with angry eyes, "let us hope that yonder scoundrel goes out of your life forever. For what remains, he will account to me."

A few minutes later, Neil Preston himself was galloping downward into the beautiful valley, his heart bounding with rapture, and on his lips a verse of the little song which Beryl had caught from Tonita:

"Then sing the song we loved, love,
When all life seemed one song;
For life is none too long, love,
Ah, love is none too long."

Oh! Where Is Your Dog?

By A. S. Alexander.

Oh! where is your wandering dog tonight, while you sweetly slumber and sleep. Is he safe at home under lock and key, or out killing a neighbor's sheep? Do you always give him his daily bread, or must he hook that from the hens, and does he forage around for his eats, in the neighbors' pastures and pens? Is he out about with a troop of friends, polluting the street and the lawn, or busily digging in somebody's yard, or yowling from darkness to dawn? Does he ride around on your auto seat, where your child or an orphan should be; or is he asleep on the parlor rug, or scratching and biting a flea? Does he work each day for his bed and board, and never do mischief or harm, while faithfully watching the kids and house, and all of the stock on the farm? If he's not worthwhile in some useful way and doesn't pay for his care and keep, consign the cur to the buried bowwows and end his raids on the sheep! If you don't attend to this job at once, you may have a big bill to pay, for your dog may join in a killing bee, when you are from home some day. Or worse than that, he may go raving mad, bringing death to people and stock, yet all the dogs in all of the world can't pay for a person or flock. And food is too precious to throw away, on a vicious, worrying hound, while wool and mutton are needed by all, here at home and the world around. So do all you can to protect the sheep and have them increase and grow fat, to clothe and to feed all the people well, for there's right and sense in that. Then here's to the doom of the guilty dog, dig deeply his dishonored grave, and let no one mourn when he's put away, since his death means that lives we save!

WHAT'S THE USE?—Mother, what are we here for anyway?" asked Johnny at bedtime.

"We are here to help others, my son," replied mother, thinking of the lesson she was teaching.

"What are the others here for then?" returned the son.—Boston Post.

peas could be cut off some before they begin to bloom so as to bloom lower down and last longer? Mine go very high with most blooms at the top, and do not last long enough, although I cut them every day. They are Spencer's and grand while they last. I am sending a picture of my sweet pea row to Mrs. Wilkinson. She will show them to you if she can. Your correspondent is standing by them.

MAGGIE ROBINSON.

Mrs. Robinson.—If you had sent a good clear photograph instead of a snapshot it could have been used in the paper and then all of the sisters could have enjoyed you and your row of sweet peas. I feel rather selfish to have both to myself so will tell the rest of the COMFORT family that the snapshot shows some extra fine sweet peas and an extra fine woman, just the sort you would picture from her letter. Plump, just comfortably so, but not fat, neatly dressed and with hair combed back in a simple manner from a kindly smiling face. A face that speaks of good nature and rare judgment on all things.—Ed.

ILLINOIS.

MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

As I have been a reader of dear old COMFORT for three years and knocked at the door once before but was not admitted. I'm trying again and hope very much to see this in print as dearest Hubby doesn't believe the Sisters' Corner anything but fiction. This morning I read Mrs. Bovell's letter to him and he said it was sorrowful if she really wrote it. If he sees my letter in print he can't disbelieve any longer for he read my letter to the corner before I sealed it.

Do any of the sisters let their hubbies choose their wearing apparel? I always do and you don't know how freely they will buy you pretty things if they can choose what they like to see you wear. Hubby is always buying me dresses, hosiery, shoes, and in fact everything he sees and thinks is pretty I always fall heir to. I'm always pleased with what he buys and he has chosen my clothes until I can't please myself now and always send him for any article of clothing I happen to need. He has the same idea Bachelor Bill has and wants me to stay dressed up all the time and, as he says, "look pretty and nice." But I can't go dressed up much as I have two children, a boy aged five, and a dear little girl aged three. I train them as well as I can, make my own garden, can my own fruit and do my housework, so you can see I can't go dressed up all the time though I keep myself and children clean. I have my hands full to do that.

Bachelor Bill, did you ever stop to think of the hubbies going "dolled up" also? I'll bet you never did. But we'll excuse you this time as your last letter was quite favorable toward our sex.

I, like Mrs. Dosser Farley, was only thirteen when I married one of the dearest of men and was not quite fifteen when my little boy was born. I am twenty now and ugly, though Buddie says I'm pretty. I am five feet, five inches tall and weigh 137 pounds. Have brown hair, blue eyes, and a medium complexion.

LITTLE BELLE.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around The Home

Mildew on leather may be removed by rubbing with vaseline.

Add the beaten white of an egg to apple sauce and it will not turn dark.

Salt thrown on a coal fire while broiling steak will prevent the fat blazing.

Moisten fresh fruit stains on table linen with camphor before putting it in water.

When the tips of shoe laces fall off, dip the ends in paraffin or wind with thread and they will be as good as new.

Add the well beaten white of an egg to mashed potatoes and you will find that it greatly improves the looks and taste.

Wash an oilcloth in the usual way and then rub it with a cloth dipped in milk to keep it bright. Do not use strong soapsuds.

If you use sal hepatica the large size bottles make good salt and pepper shakers. Take a small nail and make a neat design in holes in the aluminum top. The jars are easy to keep clean.—MRS. RAY DEAIN, Arizona.

FLY STICKUMFAST.—Melt six ounces of rosin in a tin cup, add one rounding tablespoon of lard and stir together. When cold, spread upon stiff paper with flat piece of wood or old knife. Heat the knife before using. Place on table or spot most frequented by the flies. It will hold all that get onto it.—L. C., Hattiesburg, Miss.

If any member of the family smokes have him buy his tobacco in pound glass jars and use the jars for various purposes around the kitchen; a match holder, containers for salt, tea, coffee, rice, raisins, breakfast food, pieces of string and anything that may suggest itself. The cover fits tightly on the jar and keeps the contents cleaner than when left in boxes. These being glass, you can see just where everything is and how much you have on hand. They are easy to keep clean and make your kitchen more attractive.

Remedies

RHEUMATISM.—One half oz. gum camphor, one half oz. ammonia, one half oz. sulphuric ether, and one half pint alcohol. Mix together, shake well before using. Apply externally three times a day but do not bind on with cloths for it blisters that way.—MRS. M. B. WOOD, Rockville, N. Y.

The water found in so many places is very hard on the hands and no matter how becomingly one is dressed, if the hands are red and rough they are a source of much discomfort. By using the following lotion the hands can be kept smooth and white. Crush six quince seeds and put in a bottle; add four ounces of bay rum, two ounces of glycerine and juice of one lemon. Each time after having the hands in hard water wash with some good soap, dry thoroughly and rub a little of the lotion into the skin. If the hands are very rough, wash in hot water and plenty of soap and rub white vaseline into them before going to bed.—MRS. ROY DRAIN, Arizona.

Using Tobacco

Perhaps you've tried to stop using tobacco only to find that the habit has such a hold on you that you gave up trying.

You know, better than anyone else that you ought to stop because, sooner or later, it is bound to undermine your health. Heart trouble, indigestion, dyspepsia, nervousness, insomnia, poor eye sight—these and many other disorders, can often be traced directly to the use of tobacco. Besides it is an expensive, utterly useless habit.

Habit Banished

In 48 to 72 Hours

No matter how firm a grip tobacco has on you—no matter whether you've been smoking cigars, pipe or cigarettes or chewing plug or fine cut for a month or 50 years—Tobacco Redeemer will positively remove all craving for tobacco in any form in from 48 to 72 hours. It does its work so quickly that all tobacco "hunger" is gone almost before you know it. Your desire for a smoke or a chew begins to decrease after the very first dose.

Tobacco Redeemer contains no habit-forming drugs of any kind—it is in no sense a tobacco substitute. It does not cause the slightest shock to the nervous system; on the contrary, it quiets the nerves and makes you feel better in every way.

SEND Coupon for Proof Get our free booklet. Tells you all about the deadly effects of tobacco and how easy it is now to quit. We will also send you copies of letters from confirmed users telling how this simple, home-treatment freed them absolutely from the habit. Just mail coupon—or a postal will do.

Are You A Woman Who Wants To Become A Better Cook—A Better Housekeeper?

IF so, you need this new book just published by COMFORT.

It is, we believe, the most valuable, most helpful book for the American housewife ever written. For it will help any woman to become a better cook and a better housekeeper—and at a saving of money almost unbelievable in these days of high prices.

Its scores upon scores of tried and proven recipes call for only the most common, inexpensive ingredients, yet you will find them to be the most wholesome, appetizing, satisfying dishes ever eaten in your home. No grandmother of olden days ever made more delicious bread, pies, cakes and puddings than you can make with the aid of these prize-winning, money-saving recipes—to say nothing of the waffles and muffins, turnovers and puffs, cookies and doughnuts, tarts and all kinds of toothsome pastry.

The secret of correct mixing proportions, with tables of cooking weights and measures, are described, as are also the right way to use eggs in cooking and the best methods of cooking and serving meat, fish, chicken, and all kinds of vegetables.

There are pages of special cooking hints—instructions on how to plan and prepare an economical breakfast, dinner and supper for the average family—what to cook for the sick—Christmas cakes and candies—Easter luncheons—how to keep food from spoiling in any weather—how to eliminate food waste by making use of "left-overs"—and other bits of helpful advice all contributed by women who are expert cooks and know what they are talking about. But this book is

More Than A Cook Book!

In it you will also find countless household hints and suggestions that will enable you to make, with your own hands, and at practically no expense, many new labor-saving devices for the kitchen and articles of needed furniture and decorative furnishings—you will learn how to have an efficient kitchen—how to save fuel, oil and gas—to care for, clean and conserve clothing and household utensils—to take "short cuts" in washing, housecleaning and the other hundred and one housewifely duties in the home.

It also explains how to prepare and can all kinds of meats, vegetables and fruits by steam pressure—how to can and preserve fruit in season, with special recipes for jam, jellies, etc., etc.,—how to dry vegetables and fruit—how to salt, pickle and ferment green vegetables for winter use.

Then there are pages devoted to home and the care, culture and housing of winter plants and winter blooming bulbs, all of which are of unusual interest and fascination to the wife and mother, while for the men folks there are articles on the use of paint, and light and power plants.

There is still more in this great book but lack of space prevents a further description. Let us send you a copy—it will cost you nothing if you accept our free offer below. It is a handsome book of 192 pages, 6 inches by 8½ inches in size, and many illustrations, printed on fine paper, durably bound, with illustrated colored covers.

FREE OFFER. For only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents, we will send you a copy of this book—"COMFORT'S Home Maker's Help and Family Guide"—free by mail postpaid. Premium No. 8301.

"Nuxated Iron Put Added Power Behind My Punch"

Says Jack Dempsey—Tiger Of The Ring

Heavyweight Champion of the World Tells A Secret of the Training Which Helped Get Him Into Such Superb Condition That He Was Able to Whip the Mighty Jess Willard and Prove Himself THE SUPERMAN OF THE AGE

Jack Kearns, Manager for Dempsey, Jimmy DeForest, Chief Trainer, and Others Give Opinions How Nuxated Iron Helps Strengthen the Nerves, Restore Wasted Tissue and Build RED BLOOD, STRENGTH and ENDURANCE.

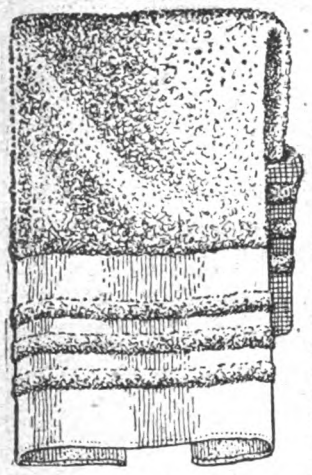
Since his overwhelming victory at Toledo when he wrested the World's Championship title from the Goliath-like Jess Willard, Jack Dempsey, the modern David and Miracle Man of the Fistic World—Jack Kearns, his manager, and Jimmy DeForest, his chief trainer, have been besieged with inquiries as to the methods employed in rounding him into such superb condition. That Jack Dempsey used Nuxated Iron as a part of the training which produced such marvelous physical development as to make him a veritable human dynamo, should prove conclusively the paramount value he attached to this master strength and blood builder and he explains below why he now recommends it to others.

Just as when a man's life is at stake, physicians seek only the tried and proven treatment, so when the World's Championship hung in the balance, Dempsey's trainers did not stop to experiment with metallic iron preparations—Nux and Iron—or other products of questionable value, but they insisted upon having only genuine Nuxated Iron, which they felt could be absolutely relied upon to help build red blood, power and stamina.

In connection with this feature of his training regarding which Dempsey himself makes a statement below, Jimmy DeForest, the Champion's Chief Trainer, is quoted as saying: "For seven weeks previous to July 4th I was in sole charge of the training and preparing of Jack Dempsey for his fight with Jess Willard. During the training period Dempsey was regularly given by me Nuxated Iron and I believe it contributed to his success."

The importance that the Champion himself places upon the part Nuxated Iron played in winning for him the highest laurels known in the athletic world is clearly shown in the following statement made by Jack Dempsey at his training quarters in Toledo, the scene of the big battle, when he said: "After commencing the use of Nuxated Iron during my training for the big fight with Jess Willard, I soon noticed that I could stand harder strains with less fatigue than before, and I realized that I had found a tonic and blood builder which played an important part in getting me into fine condition. Formerly I had relied solely upon strength-building foods and outdoor exercise to keep my blood rich in red corpuscles, but with the World's Championship at stake, I felt that I should leave nothing undone that might help me to win. I was advised of the great value of Nuxated Iron for building up the blood, strenthening the nerves and aiding in keeping the body fit, and I am firmly convinced that its use has helped to wonderfully increase my stamina and endurance. Nuxated Iron put added power behind my punch and helped me to accomplish what I did at Toledo. From the results in my own case, where the possession of super endurance is necessary, I feel that I am in a position to strongly recommend Nuxated Iron to every man and woman who wants to build greater strength, energy and power."

Manager Jack Kearns who closely watched from day to day the progress of Dempsey's training in which Nuxated Iron played a part and who predicted Dempsey's victory over Willard.



Jimmy DeForest, the Champion's Chief Trainer, tells here why he believes the use of Nuxated Iron by Dempsey contributed to his success.

In connection with the foregoing statement made by Jack Dempsey, Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.), New York, and the Westchester County Hospital, said: "In my opinion whoever made the suggestion that Nuxated Iron should play a part in getting Dempsey into condition is to be commended for his foresight. No man without plenty of rich, red blood filled with health-giving and strength-building iron could withstand the terrific onslaughts of a giant like Willard. It should occur to every thinking person that if a man as physically fit as Dempsey should consider it advisable to take Nuxated Iron, how much more important it is for the average man or woman to see that there is no lack of iron in the blood. To help make strong, keen, red-blooded Americans there is nothing in my experience which I have found so valuable as organic iron—Nuxated Iron.

MANUFACTURERS' NOTE: Nuxated Iron which has been used by Jack Dempsey and which is prescribed and recommended above by physicians is not a secret remedy but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products it is easily assimilated and does not injure the teeth, make them black nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser or they will refund your money. It is dispensed by all good druggists.

Gold Birthstone Rings

THE most popular ladies' rings worn today are these beautiful birthstone rings. Not only is it considered lucky to wear one of them but they are now and always will be exceedingly stylish. We are able to illustrate only three of the rings but there are twelve in all—a different stone for each month of the year, and of course you should wear the stone that is symbolical of the month you were born. The following is a list of the twelve rings, names of the stones and the month to which they apply:

No. 8411, January, Garnet. No. 8421, February, Amethyst. No. 8431, March, Bloodstone. No. 8441, April, Diamond. No. 8451, May, Emerald. No. 8461, June, Agate. No. 8471, July, Ruby. No. 8481, August, Sardonyx. No. 8491, September, Sapphire. No. 8501, October, Opal. No. 8511, November, Topaz. No. 8521, December, Turquoise.

Each ring is guaranteed genuine gold filled, which looks exactly like solid gold and will wear for years. In fact we absolutely guarantee each ring for at least five years. The rings themselves are perfectly plain, the stones are solitaires and perfect imitations of the real gems. The setting of each ring is the ever popular "Tiffany" style. As a Christmas, Birthday or all-the-year-round gift for wife, mother, sweetheart or sister, nothing could be more appropriate and acceptable than one of these beautiful guaranteed rings set with the birthstone of the person to whom it is given. We will send you one of these rings free upon the terms of the following offer:

Given To You. For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents, we will send you one of these beautiful gold-filled Rings by parcel post, prepaid. Please be sure to give size and number of ring wanted.

to starve, perhaps, for there seemed nothing that her hands could do!

Before she had a chance to tell Nancy of her decision, something else happened that, for the time, put it quite out of her mind.

Daphne, sweeping off the dead wistaria leaves from the front porch, beheld an unusual sight—an automobile coming as briskly as possible along the weed-grown drive. An automobile containing only the chauffeur and one passenger—it was evidently a hired car—an old lady, small and spry, who hopped out as the chauffeur opened the door very like a brown sparrow, she was so light on her feet.

"Howdy, Daphne," called the old lady, briskly. "Come out here and help me tote in these bundles."

"De land—— if it ain't Miss Marthy Warner!" chuckled Daphne, delightedly. "Miss Eleanor—Miss Nancy! Y'all come out here see Miss Marthy Warner done come visitin'."

Rather bewildered, Eleanor and Nancy obeyed, and the old lady promptly kissed them both, in the friendliest way possible.

"You're Eleanor," she said, instantly. "I'd know the Talcott favor anywhere. And you're a pretty little girl enough," she admitted, patting Nancy on her rosy cheek. "And you are just about my height, which makes me like you better. I do despise always to be looking up to folks! Daphne, take that bundle right along in the kitchen—it's steak, and good steak, too. I know how it is in the country—people get so everlastingly tired of chickens and middling-meat. That's a pineapple—a big, juicy one in that basket, and some California grapes, and some Florida oranges. Florida oranges beat the world, I told 'em, out West, but they wouldn't believe me. Lord, their ripe prunes are so good—and grapes big as hickory-nuts! Here, you, man——" to the chauffeur, "look under that seat and haul out that bunch of bananas. I know how it is in the country, children, for I've lived in it myself—you just perish to death for fruit! Till peaches and figs get ripe, that is. Now—Daphne, come back here and take this bottle of port wine—I was afraid some of you might get sick, so far from a doctor, and a body ought to have a drop in the house, though I belong to the W. C. T. U., myself, and never touch it unless for the stomach's sake, as Paul recommended to Timothy, and what the Apostle Paul says, any man can lay to be right!"

She paused, rather breathlessly, and Nancy found herself wondering how Eleanor would receive these gifts. Would she treat this friendly old lady as she had done the Muirs?

No, indeed! Eleanor delightedly received them, and profusely thanked the donor. "We were just perishing for fruit," she frankly admitted, "and I haven't seen any steak in an age, it seems to me. Thank you very, very much, dear Mrs. Warner—you were so good to remember us!"

The little old lady, dismissing the chauffeur, with directions to return for her in the afternoon—and not to come too early—trotted along in to the house, and took off her bonnet before the mirror in the girls' room, and made herself comfortable in the little rocker, turning up her skirt thriftily, and sticking out her tiny feet to be warmed by the blaze, for it was still cool, in the early morning, and Daphne always built "her young ladies," as she called them, a fire to take the chill off.

"It's wonderful, out in the big West, but it's mighty good to be home again," she sighed, as she dived into her bag and brought forth a cumbrous bundle of knitting. "An afghan for the baby," she explained; "I've got to be doing something for him all the time, the sweet! If it hadn't been for Pa and my poor boy, who needs his mammy, even if he is a bald-headed old bachelor, I'd have staid on a year longer—anyway, till he had cut all his teeth. Eleanor, child," turning her bright, sparrow-like eyes upon Eleanor, while her fingers busily knitted away at the pink and white wool, "I know you are glad to be home, where your own folks lived and died, even if it is right lonely for you, being young—and mighty pretty! Have you got a beau, honey?"

"Nary one," laughed Eleanor, her eyes bright, her cheeks flushing with the happiness of seeing one of her very own people, who understood her feelings. "But Nancy has—a darling one."

"H'umph—she's pretty enough; though most men would prefer you, I should think. Men are fools, though. If Son wasn't so shy, I'd send him to see you—never mind, I'll scare up one from somewhere!"

So they laughed and chatted and joked happily with the old lady till the morning had passed, and Daphne, with beaming face, announced dinner.

And such a dinner! How hungrily they ate the juicy steak, and felt new life flow in their veins with its grateful juices; how eagerly they devoured the melting pineapple, and oranges, and bananas, which Daphne had compounded into a bowl of wonderful ambrosia, worthy of its name.

After dinner, their guest, stabbing her ball of yarn thoughtfully with her big, wooden needles, asked abruptly: "And have you-all hunted around for the treasure yet?—the bags of gold your great-great-Uncle Talcott hid from the Yankees?"

"Mercy, no!" said Eleanor, wide-eyed with wonder. "I didn't know there was the remotest possibility of a treasure—didn't—didn't the Federal soldiers take it away, in a skirmish, when they killed Uncle Talcott?"

"So some believe—but not me," nodded the old lady, with ungrammatical emphasis. "I always believed he hid it before the Yankees killed him and the overseer. I've said to Pa, a thousand times, I reckon, 'Don't you reckon old Colonel Talcott hid that money somewhere about the place?' Yes—and if I had been Emily I'd have hunted day and night till I found it! My belief is, it's hid somewhere in these very walls! You know they didn't burn our homes here like they did in Virginia and Carolina—we didn't suffer so much, I must say. Your uncle knew it would be safe—he probably had the bags of gold in an iron box, maybe—or if he didn't he could have dropped them down, one by one—well, say behind some secret panel, or some place like that. I've always heard this old house was full of such places—it's a mighty old house, you know, built in revolutionary times, out of English brick, that's the reason it's so sound. Fifty thousand dollars ain't to be sneezed at. If I were you-all, I'd go to work and hunt for it!"

"Fifty thousand dollars!" breathed Eleanor, star-eyed with hope. "Oh, Nancy, if we only found it! Think of the things we could have—the house repaired, the grove trimmed up, flowers in the garden, a—a horse and carriage. We could afford to be neighborly!"

"De oughtermobeel done come, Miss Marthy," announced Daphne, at the door, and Mrs. Warner gathered her belongings together and prepared to take her departure. Not, however, before she had emphatically urged upon Eleanor the necessity of search for the lost treasure; rapidly recommending them to look in various places, as she donned her bonnet and cloak.

"Not a speck of proof that he didn't hide it," she declared, as she kissed them good by at the hall door—so that the chauffeur could not hear her parting injunctions. "I always believed—and Emily believed, though she never had spunk to search—that he hid it right here! You-all begin, right away—and I believe you'll find it!"

The two girls looked at each other with hope shining in their eyes, as they saw the last of the automobile and its small passenger.

"Nancy," said Eleanor, solemnly, "I believe she is right—we'll begin right away to search for the Talcott treasure!"

12 Silver Teaspoons FOR A CLUB OF TWO

BY buying in large quantities we are enabled to offer our readers this handsome set of twelve teaspoons for the ridiculously small club mentioned above. They are six inches long, silver plated on a white metal base, so there is no brass to show through, and they will never have that dingy or tarnished appearance even after years of constant use. The design is the beautiful "Morning Glory" deeply embossed on the handles which are finished in soft, elegant French grey. The bowls of the spoons are perfectly smooth and bright polished.

The rich design and splendid wearing qualities of these teaspoons combine to make this the most attractive premium offer in years. Our illustration does not do them justice. They must be seen to be appreciated. We know they will exceed your highest expectations.

Remember, that although we illustrate but six spoons, we are going to send you a full dozen. They are yours free if you will accept the following special offer.

Club Offer. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you one dozen (12) of these fine Silver Plated Teaspoons free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 9332.

Send Only Three Subscriptions For This Cut Glass Sugar and Creamer—Or Two Subscriptions For The Pickle Dish Or Spoon Tray!

WE want to ask our women readers—did you ever see or hear of a more remarkable offer?

Just think of the small number of subscriptions required to earn any one or all of these beautiful cut glass pieces.

And it is real cut glass—of good weight and thickness—clear, brilliant, crystal glass, exquisitely hand cut in a new and beautiful design. Each piece is full size with the same handsome floral pattern that twines completely around the outside in graceful curves, while on the bottom of each piece is a heavily cut, many-pointed star. The rim of both sugar and creamer is deeply notched.

Do you wonder how we can make this offer? A certain factory, realizing that we shall probably use thousands of these sets, has made us an unusually low price. That's the whole story. And the result is we can give you your choice of this rich genuine cut glass absolutely free in return for the easiest half hour's work you ever did.

We Prepay Charges And Positively Guarantee Safe Delivery

Any or all of these pieces can be safely mailed by parcel post. We pay all postage and guarantee safe delivery to your home. If by chance a piece should become broken (something that rarely happens) we will replace it free of charge.

We know that every woman that receives one or more of these rich cut glass pieces will be amazed and delighted with the bargain she has obtained. It is easily the greatest value in a premium that we have ever been able to offer. We will give you your choice of the Sugar and Creamer, or the Pickle Dish, or the Spoon Tray absolutely free on the terms of the following special

Club Offers. For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you the Sugar and Creamer by prepaid insured parcel post. (Premium No. 8883). Or for two one-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you your choice of either the Pickle Dish (Premium No. 9402), or the Spoon Tray (Premium No. 9412). Or we will send you the complete set of all four pieces free and prepaid for a club of seven one-year subscriptions at 50 cents each. (Premium No. 7457).

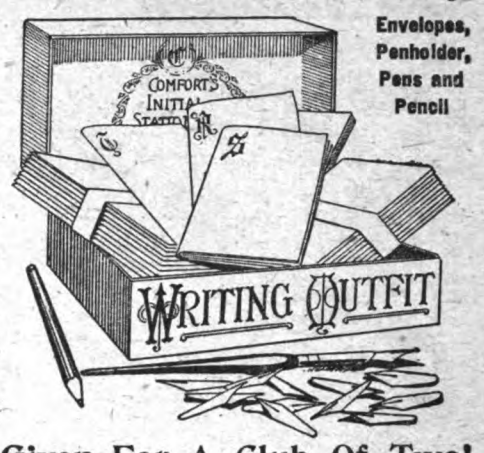
26-Piece Table Set

Yours Prepaid For A Club Of Seven



WE have in the past made many offers of table-ware, but this is the first time we have been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for so small a club. And please don't think that because we are giving this set on liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. On the contrary, it has a white metal base; therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration, there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory, that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have offered and we guarantee every Set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this 26-Piece Table Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of seven one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Table Set free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 7397.

Gate Top Mesh Purse

THIS is the new "Gate Top" mesh purse with a ten-inch wrist chain, handsome, stylish, and perfectly safe for the carrying of money and other valuables. A slight pull with the forefinger of each hand instantly opens the purse, a gentle pressure with thumb and finger closes it. Our illustration shows the purse closed. When open the top is as large as the bottom, or in other words, two inches in diameter. When closed it leaves an opening only three-fourths of an inch wide over which the brightly polished German silver cover snaps down tightly so that the contents of the purse cannot possibly become lost. This dainty purse is now extremely fashionable so we have purchased a quantity for the benefit of those of our lady and girl readers who like to be up-to-date in these little accessories. You can have one of them free by taking advantage of the following

Premium No. 7833

Stylish Bead Necklace

Jade, Coral, Amber, Blue and Red — Yours For A Club Of Only Two

THE great popularity of these new style necklaces leads us to make this offer to our women and girl readers. In fact, there seems to be a veritable CRAZE for these beautiful, large, odd-shaped beads, which come in different colors to match the costume, and of generous length, so that they hang well down the front of the dress. They are not strung on string or wire but are fastened together with tiny, glittering, silver-colored rings, which form a pleasing contrast with the rich, subdued colors of the beads themselves. Some of these necklaces—which, by the way, retail as high as $5.00—are enormous in size, others are quite small; we picked out a medium size, thinking it would please the greater number of our readers. It is 30 inches long, two of the beads are larger than the rest, as shown in the illustration, while at the very end and serving as a pendant, there hangs a large, handsome, oblong-shaped bead an inch and a quarter long. The smaller beads in this necklace are each five eighths of an inch long and there are forty-two beads in all.

We will send you one of these handsome and stylish necklaces—your choice of red, blue, amber, coral and jade—upon the terms of the following offer.

Given to You. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this necklace free by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to mention color wanted. Premium No. 9232.

Two Dolls Given!

THE little boy's name is Johnnie, his sister's name is Josie, and they make the most charming pair of twin dolls you ever saw. They are entirely different from the ordinary doll, having a life-like head made of an indestructible composition, a new style cloth body and the latest improved jointed arms and legs which never get out of order. Neither doll can be broken, because both head and body are indestructible. They are over a foot tall, with rosy cheeks and blue eyes, and dressed just as you see them in the picture. Josie has on a cute pink-and-white dress. Johnnie is dressed in pretty pink-and-white rompers. They look so life-like in their baby clothes with their happy, smiling faces, you would almost think they were alive and ready to talk to you in that baby language so dear to the heart of every little doll mother. We are sure no little boy or girl ever had a doll that could furnish quite so much real satisfaction and enjoyment as either one of these two handsome twins. Remember these are real American-made, unbreakable dolls, with a strong, durable, stuffed cloth body, jointed arms and legs and an indestructible composition head that will not break. They will last a long time.

Club Offer. For five one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you both dolls—Josie and Johnnie—free by parcel post prepaid. (Premium No. 7525.) Or for three one-year subscriptions at 50 cents each we will send you one doll—your choice of Josie Premium No. 8813), or Johnnie (Premium No. 8823), free by parcel post, prepaid. When ordering be sure to give the premium number of doll or dolls wanted.

"I am a girl." What kind of a girl is an a girl? This state is not lacking in good schools and teachers as are many sections of this country, especially the South, so there is no excuse except that of utter carelessness, which is the curse of the age, for young ladies of twelve writing "an" for "am." You have quite a lot of stock on your farm and you are to be envied as you don't have to pay three hundred dollars a quart for milk as we do in the city, but we have the laugh on you for we can sleep while you are waking up the cows in the middle of the night and doing the milking. If, however, it costs as much to feed your large family as it does my family of two (and I've got them down to one pickle and half a doughnut a day and am thinking of cutting out the pickle) then I don't envy you. But old Dame Nature helps you out while all she does for us is to souse our roof with so much water that we have the ceiling dropping on our heads and have to fish for the dining-room table every time we want to take a meal. Old Dame Nature has no use for prohibition in this vicinity. She is the most horrible example of an incorrigible wet I have ever struck. You don't tell us in what class of the animal kingdom Nigger and Colonel belong. Naturally, you would not name any of your cows Nigger or Colonel, though the Battalion of Death, composed entirely of women, who were the last to make a stand against the vile Bolsheviki in Petrograd, had a Colonel. Most of these heroines, who put up a glorious fight, were shot to death. Of those wounded or captured, not a trace has ever been found. That's what women soldiers get when their curs of men are too proud to fight, but not too proud to ravish, outrage and murder. Probably Nigger and Colonel are the colts and do not belong in either the cow or the chicken family. So you have plum trees. Maybe you are experimenting with the Plumb plan. There is a gentleman of that name who has a scheme up his sleeve for running the railroads. By the aid of this scheme the railroad men will get all the plums while the public will pay all the bills, and the cost of living and lunacy will go soaring higher than ever. There are millions of gentlemen with beautiful schemes which will not stand a moment's practical investigation, chasing madly around, desirous of relieving all those who have saved even ten cents to tide them over a rainy day or keep them out of the poorhouse in their old age. Keep your eye on these smooth-tongued, visionary, trouble-making profiteers. If people would only work, produce, save, and cut out luxuries, with the same vim and energy that they kick and scheme, we should not have to call on visionary gentlemen who crawl out of plumb trees to settle our problems, for we should not have any problems that even a sleeping cow named Colonel or a cackling hen called Nigger could not solve.

OPELIKA, ALA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a girl of sixteen summers, have black hair, cat eyes, and dark complexion, weigh one hundred and twenty-one pounds. A young man of twenty-seven has been constantly sending me candy and calls once each week at least and sometimes more often. He lives fifty miles from my home. My mother and father object because he has a small fortune and are afraid he will tire of me and be always saying you were only a poor factory hand when I married you and now you want to waste what I have. I am quite sure however they are mistaken. But there is another young man twenty-two years old, who is, I think, one of the goodie goodie kind because he does not care anything for entertainments and just acts like a preacher. Yet he does not want to be one. I have finally decided if I would allow myself I could love him too. Which one should I marry? Both are going to wait until I am twenty-one before marrying, if I want them to wait that long. Please give me some of your good advice.

Your niece, BEATRICE H———.

Beatrice, as you have decided, as all sensible girls should, not to mary until you are twenty-one, you need not worry much about the two young men who are at present laying siege to your heart, for in another five years probably neither of these suitors will appeal to you and probably, too, by that time they will have met other girls and have forgotten your existence. The girl of twenty-one seldom marries the boy she fancied at sixteen. The gentleman who walks fifty miles to see you must certainly think a whole lot of you, and if you keep him walking until you are twenty-one, that small fortune of his will probably be dissipated in shoe leather. Maybe, however, he comes on horseback, and if he does he is wearing out four shoes instead of two. I think he is very foolish to send the candy. Whenever I called on a girl I always took the candy along and that gave me a chance to eat at least nine tenths of it while the young lady admired the box. I never could understand why girls ate candy, anyhow, considering they are all just too sweet for anything. I would not worry about that fellow's small fortune. If he keeps on buying candy and walking or riding for the next five years, he won't have any fortune to throw in your face and if he does there won't be enough left to hurt. If he is such a low-down cad as to remind you that you were a factory girl before he married you, just remind him that the wife of Peter the Great of Russia, who later became Catherine the Great, was a peasant girl. This is a democracy in which all people are supposed to be created equal even if they are not. The factory girl fills a much more important place in our social system than the indolent society lady. The war, however, has taken the indolence out of the rich and all are busy now. Don't turn your nose up at the goody goody young man. He may be another Billy Sunday in disguise for all you know. Better have a goody goody boy who stays at home and helps you with the dishes than a whisky-drinking sport who throws them at your head. Better have one that goes to Sunday school than to the blind tiger. Perhaps the small fortune candy man might make the best husband for week days and the goody goody man the best for Sundays. As the law, however, only allows a lady to have one husband, you will have to decide for yourself whether you want a pedestrian or a preacher, a walker or a talker. Don't worry, however, for in five years hence you will have forgotten both.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs fifty-five cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The fifty-five cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

How to become a Member

Send fifty-five cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for November.

Electric Flash Light

With Powerful Long-Lived Battery

Premium No. 7984

For Four Subscriptions

6½ inches Long, 1½ inches in Diameter

ARE you in the habit of stumbling around in the dark with the uncertain aid of lighted matches or dangerous kerosene lamps or lanterns? Don't do it any longer! It's dangerous—as you very well know—and entirely unnecessary. Get an Eveready Daylo or "flash light" and you have all the advantages of the incandescent electric light in portable form. It can easily be carried in the hand or pocket. It is always ready for use—a simple movement of the finger turns the light on and off as desired—and it is absolutely safe. No matter what happens it positively cannot set anything on fire.

In the night it shows you your way around the house without fuss or bother—it lights up the darkest rooms, stairways, closets, the dark corners in attic or basement. You can use it in the shed, stable, barn, around hay, powder, gasoline—in fact, any and all kinds of inflammable material and explosives without the slightest danger.

The Eveready is just as useful outdoors as it is indoors. Neither wind nor rain can put it out. When riding or walking after nightfall, it throws a shaft of brilliant light far in advance, showing up every object long before you reach it. The loneliest road, the gloomiest depths of the woods, need have no terrors for you if you go prepared with an Eveready.

The Eveready is 6½ inches long, 1½ inches in diameter equipped with a strong reflecting lens, Mazda bulb and the latest improved Tungsten battery. This battery with average use will last from two to four months, the bulb from six months to one year. Fresh batteries and bulbs may be obtained from us or any hardware or general store at trifling expense. The light itself—that is, the case and everything except the battery and bulb—is good for many years, in fact with proper care should last an ordinary lifetime.

We will give you this Eveready Daylo or "flash light" complete with battery and bulb, all ready for business upon the terms of the following

Club Offer. For four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you an Eveready Daylo complete as described above, free by parcel post, prepaid (Premium No. 7984). We can also supply you with extra batteries at the rate of one battery for two one-year subscriptions at 50 cents each (Premium No. 9172), and extra bulbs at the rate of one bulb for one one-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents (Premium No. 8131).

Little Dorothy the Cut-Out Doll

Dorothy at the Seashore

DOROTHY spent the summer at the seashore. You could see her at the sandy beach every day, digging with her little shovel and stringing shells on a long cord which she would wear around her neck for beads. One day a little crab clung to Dorothy's finger and she ran crying to her mamma but when she got there to show how awfully she was hurt the crab was nowhere to be seen for it had fallen off. The other little girls laughed at her and she could not help laughing herself, even though there were tears in her eyes.

It was a pleasant summer for there was such a nice place to play and so many to play with that she could not get lonesome.

When the month of September came around, however, all the other girls came and bid Dorothy good by because they had to go to school. Some of them were big and some were little, but all were very nice and when they had departed Dorothy was so lonesome she did not know what to do.

Instead of humming glad songs, as it had been doing, the ocean began to make sounds like sighing and sobbing and wailing and the scared child would not go near it.

Her little shovel got rusty from not being used and when her string of shell beads broke, she never tried to fix them. Dorothy knew she was making her mamma feel bad and tried hard to pick up courage but she could not.

At last she grew thin and sallow and had to go to bed. They thought she was sick but she was only lonesome. The doctor knew this when he came and looked at her and heard her story and he said to her mother: "Why, Dorothy is pining away for companionship. She must have playmates and workmates of her own age. If you send her to school where there are plenty of children, she will be all right in a week."

The next Monday morning Dorothy was all dressed up as you see in the picture and with her books and slate in her arms, started for school. There she met many of her seashore friends and many new girls she had never seen before. It made her happy and gay and in a week she was as fat and lovely as ever.

Cut-Out Doll Directions

Paste the entire picture on cardboard and when it has dried flat and smooth, cut out each figure with scissors. The extending flaps at the shoulders must be carefully cut around and left on for they are used to bend over and hold the dress to the doll.

Each costume should be a different color. You can do the tinting yourself with chalk or crayon. I think it would be appropriate to have the sailor suit with shovel in hand, blue, the school dress, with books and slate, pink trimmed with green, and the plain little home dress either white or light blue. When you get tired of one color you can change it to suit your own taste. The oblong piece upon which the dolly stands must be cut out. If each end of it is bent back at right angles, it will form a support or stander. The dotted line on each bonnet and hat is cut through with a sharp knife and the slot used to slip the same down over the head and keep the head coverings on.

When you get through playing with the outfit put it in a large envelope so it will stay flat and not get broken. One little girl wrote and told me that she has a box full of cut-out dolls, all from COMFORT back numbers.

Give COMFORT To Your Friends As A Christmas Present!

WHY not! In these days of high prices where could you find a better, more inexpensive present than a one-year's subscription to COMFORT?

It is the one gift that pleases everybody—a gift that will become a cheery, welcome reminder of you month after month for an entire year—and at so little expense you will not notice it at all. Simply send us 50 cents and the name and address of the friend you wish to remember written on the coupon below and we will enter the subscription for one full year to commence with our Christmas number and with it we will also mail a beautiful Christmas Presentation Card so that both paper and card will reach your friend at about the same time. The card is beautifully colored and embossed with a dainty appropriate Christmas design and verse on one side and on the other side is a specially printed announcement of the gift and a space left for your name as the giver which we will fill in ourselves before the card is mailed.

Isn't this a splendid idea? Surely among all your friends there is someone who will appreciate and enjoy such an interesting magazine as COMFORT and who will think of you gratefully every time the carrier leaves it at the door.

Better send us your friend's name and the money now—it's none too early to avoid the Christmas rush—and you will have at least one present less to think about because we will attend to all the details. After you mail the coupon and money you can dismiss the matter from your mind as we will take good care of your order and mail both the paper and the handsome Christmas Presentation Card properly filled out with your name as the giver at precisely the right time.

Four Wheel Chairs in October

528 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The four October wheel chairs go to Richard L. Dennis, Flasher, N D., 107; Travis L. Davis, Good Spring, Tenn., 106; James A. Doherty, R. R. 1, Washburn, Maine, 99; Julia Vance, Smokemont, N. C., 93. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them.

Richard L. Dennis, age 5 years, has been paralyzed in his legs from birth and has but little use of his hands. His mother writes that she has "six other children to work for, two of them smaller than Richard," and that "the wheel chair will be a big help in taking care of him."

Travis L. Davis, age 5 years, was crippled by injuries at birth so that he has never been able to walk; he also suffers from extreme nervousness.

James A. Doherty, age 73 is crippled by rheumatism which has rendered him nearly helpless the past two years.

Mrs Julia Vance, age 39, has been crippled the past eleven years by an attack of typhoid fever which affected her spine She has no one to wait on her but her little daughter, and the wheel chair will be a great blessing to both.

James B. McGrath, credited in last month's Roll of Honor with having sent in 168 subscriptions for Oscar May, has since written me explaining that, although he sent them in, 50 of them were obtained by Mrs. A. M. Isaacs, 30 by Evona Corbin, 30 by Virginia Bailey, and 30 by Hazel Murray, and requests that these ladies be given credit for having done most of the work in procuring the subscriptions for Oscar May's wheel chair.

The following letters of thanks and Roll of Honor are interesting.

Do your best to make this Thanksgiving a season of rejoicing to the shutins by sending as many subscriptions as possible in aid of our Wheel-Chair Club.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

COMFORT Wheel Chair a Great Pleasure to Crippled Girl.

Fordtown, Tenn.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

My sister, Omie Gray, received her wheel chair August 11th, and is well pleased with it. She can wheel herself through the house with it, which gives her great pleasure. It is also a help to me in taking care of her We wish to thank you and all who helped to procure the chair for her. Wishing COMFORT success, I am sincerely your friend,

Sallie F. Gray.

Very Much Pleased with Her COMFORT Wheel Chair.

Trio, S. C.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

My wheel chair has arrived and I am very much pleased with it, so much so that I cannot express thanks enough to cover my appreciation and gratitude for the kindness shown me by you and all others who helped me to obtain it.

Your devoted friend,

Dora Elizabeth Howard.

COMFORT'S Roll of Honor

The Roll of Honor comprises the names of those who have sent five or more subscriptions, or a dollar or more in money, to credit of the Wheel-Chair Club during the month previous. Following each name is the number of subscriptions sent.

The Black Flag

A gunboat was entering the mouth of a river when she passed close to a small collier The officer in command hailed the latter.

"Ahoy, there! What have you got the black flag flying for?"

The reply came back: "You'd better not let the captain hear you. That's his best shirt hanging out to dry."

He Played Safe

A colored recruit said he intended to take out the full limit of government insurance, $10,000. On being told by a fellow-soldier that he would be foolish to pay on so much when he was likely to be shot in the trenches, he replied: "Huh! I reckon I know what I'm doing. You don't suppose Uncle Sam is going to put a $10,000 man in the first-line trenches, do you?"—Boston Post.

160 HENS—1500 EGGS

LAST winter eggs sold as high as $1.00 a dozen. As America's foremost poultry expert I predict that this winter eggs will go even higher. Poultry raisers are going to reap tremendous profits. You, too, can make sure of a big egg yield by giving your hens a few cents' worth "More Eggs tonic."

This product has been tried, tested and proven by 400,000 chicken raisers. It is acknowledged the best and most successful egg producer on the market today. Guaranteed by a million dollar bank. Every day that you don't use it means that you are losing money. Don't delay. Start with a few cents' worth of "More Eggs" tonic now.

That's the experience of one Comfort poultry raiser who wrote me. Mrs. Myrtle Ice of Boston, Ky., writes: "'More Eggs' Tonic is a great Godsend. I was only getting 12 eggs a day and am now getting 50 a day." 400,000 chicken raisers have used this wonderful tonic. Here are a few letters of thousands received:

"160 Hens—125 Dozen Eggs"

B. J. Reefer: Waverly, Mo.
I have fed two boxes of More Eggs Tonic to my hens and I think my hens have broken the record for eggs. I have 160 White Leghorns and from March 25 to April 15 I sold 125 dozen eggs. MRS. H. M. PATTON.

"15 Hens—310 Eggs"

B. J. Reefer: Turner Falls, Mass.
I used your More Egg Tonic and from December 1 to February 1, from 15 hens, I got 310 eggs. Your remedies are just what you claim them to be MRS. C. R. STOUGHTON.

"More Than Doubled In Eggs"

B. J. Reefer: Mendon, Ill.
I am very much pleased with your "More Eggs" Tonic. My hens have more than doubled up in their eggs. L. D. NICHOLS.

Gets 100 Eggs a Day

E. J. Reefer: Hamilton, Ind.
I have given your "More Eggs" Tonic to my chickens for about two months. It is the best I ever used. My chickens have gained from 20 to 100 eggs a day and are still gaining. I cannot say enough for your "More Eggs" Tonic. LORENZO BURCH.

8,988 Eggs from 125 Hens

E. J. Reefer: Exline, Iowa.
Since using the "More Eggs," I have got more eggs than any time I have been in the poultry business, about thirty years. Since the 15th of March to November 16th, I have marketed 740 dozen and have only 125 hens. MRS. W. S. DEAHL.

1,368 Eggs After 1 Package

E. J. Reefer: Scranton, Pa.
Last fall I bought a box of your "More Eggs" Tonic and would like to have you know the results. From January 1st to July 1st, my hens laid 1,368 eggs. A. E. WHITE.

Simple, But Wonderful

E. J. Reefer: Perryville, Mo., Biehle Star Route.
I was getting 3 eggs a day, but three days after I began using "More Eggs" I got 15 a day. It is simple, but wonderful. MRS. LOUIS C. BOHNERT.

"48 Dozen in One Week"

Dear Mr. Reefer: Woodbury, Tenn.
I can't express how much I have been benefited by answering your ads. I've got more eggs than I ever did. I've sold 42½ dozen eggs last week, set 6 dozen, ate some and had 1½ dozen left.
From your friend, MRS. LENA McBROON.

"Selling Eggs Now"

B. J. Reefer: Hebo, Oregon
I was not getting an egg when I began the use of the "More Eggs" Tonic. Now I am selling eggs. MRS. J. F. BRINK.

"Gets Winter Eggs"

E. J. Reefer: Wilburton, Kan.
It is the first time I got so many eggs in winter. When I began using "More Eggs" I was only getting from 1 to 3 eggs per day and now I am getting 11 to 13 eggs per day. MRS. JULIA GOODEN.

18 Hens—12 Eggs a Day

E. J. Reefer: Luray, Va.
Six weeks ago I began giving "More Eggs" Tonic and I was not getting an egg from 18 hens, and now I am getting 10 to 12 every day. You can quote me as saying that it is the best chicken tonic in the world. E. L. REYNOLDS

"37 Eggs a Day"

B. J. Reefer: Elwood, Indiana
That More Eggs Tonic is simply grand. When I started using it they did not lay at all, now I get 37 eggs a day. Yours truly, EDGAR E. J. LINNIGER.

"Doubles Egg Production"

B. J. Reefer: Paradise, Texas.
I have been using More Eggs Tonic 3 or 4 weeks and must say it is fine. My egg production has been doubled. J. C. KOENINGER.

"Increases from 8 to 36 Eggs a Day"

E. J. Reefer: Shady Bend, Kansas.
I am well pleased with your More Eggs Tonic. I was only getting 8 or 9 eggs, now I am getting 3 dozen a day. Yours truly, WM. SCHMIDT.

"Increase from 2 to 45 Eggs a Day"

Reefer's Hatchery: Derby, Iowa
Since I began the use of your More Eggs Tonic 2 weeks ago I am getting 45 eggs a day, and before I was only getting 2 or 3 a day. Yours truly, DORA PHILLIPS.

"More Eggs" Paid the Pastor

E. J. Reefer; Woodbury, Tenn.
I can't express in words how much I have been benefited by "More Eggs." I paid my debts, clothed my children in new dresses, and that is not all—I paid my pastor his dues. I sold 42½ dozen eggs last week, set 4 dozen, ate some, and had 1½ dozen left. MRS. LENA McBROON.

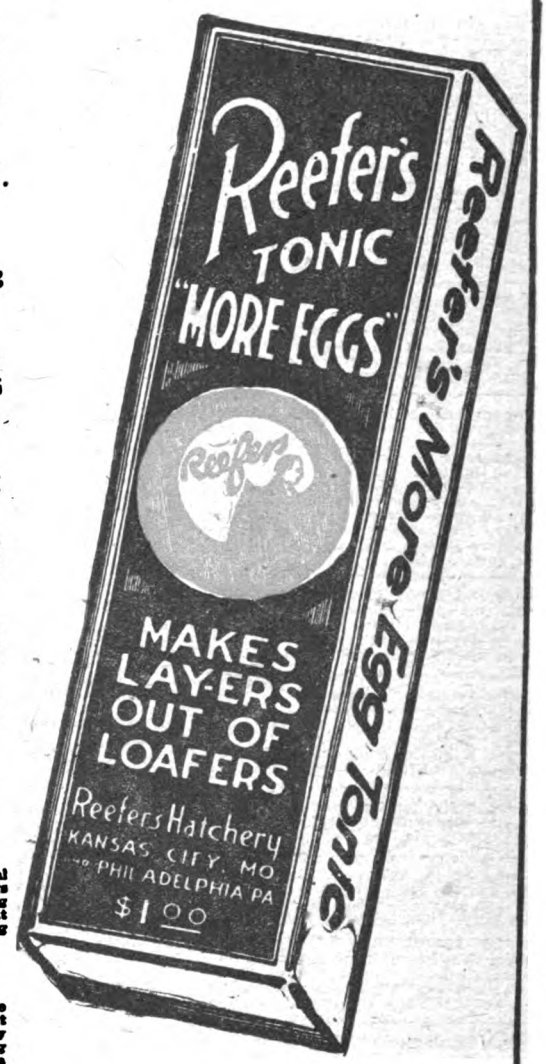
Nothing Equals More Eggs

E. J. Reefer: Steele, N. D.
I don't think there is anything to equal your More Egg Tonic. I am getting 8 eggs a day off of 9 hens. Before I was getting 1 and 2 a day, and sometimes not any at all. That Egg Tonic is certainly doing great work. MRS. WILLIAM DEER.

Gets Quick Results

E. J. Reefer: Bentwood, Ark.
The "More Eggs" Tonic I received of you is wonderful. I was getting only 1 and 2 eggs per day, and in less than two weeks was getting 12 and 14 every day. I am recommending it to my neighbors. Yours truly, Mrs. S. L. JETT.

"More Eggs" Is Finest Ever



E. J. Reefer Hewlett, Va.
I have used one package of your More Egg Tonic, and I think it is the finest thing for hens I ever used. We were only getting 3 to 4 eggs a day, and since using your Tonic we get from 17 to 22 eggs a day from 25 hens. MRS. J. H. CRISP.

126 Eggs in 5 Days

I wouldn't try to raise chickens without "More Eggs" which means more money. I use it right along. I have 33 hens and in 5 days have gotten 10½ dozen eggs or 126. MRS. J. O. OAKES, Salina, O kla did it.

$200 Worth of Eggs from 44 Hens

E. J. Reefer: Sterling, Kansas
I never used More Eggs Tonic until last December; then just used one $1.00 package and have sold over $200 worth of eggs from 44 hens. "More Eggs" Tonic A. G. THODE, R. No. 2 Box 47.

Banker Endorses "More Eggs"

E. J. Reefer: Ashland, Oregon
Some time ago I got from you "More Eggs" and it now means MORE EGGS. I am now fully convinced of its utility. I have 14 pullets and 14 hens one year old, and the first 10 days in December they laid 11 dozen eggs. Yours very truly, F. POHLAND, President, The Citizens Bank of Ashland.

Gets 35 Eggs Instead of 5

E. J. Reefer: Box 96, Pelican, La.
I have used Reefer's More Egg Tonic only two weeks and can see a great improvement in my hens. I get from 30 to 35 eggs a day now. Before I got 4 or 5 eggs a day. MRS. W. T. JOHNSON, Box 96.

No Loafers Now

E. J. Reefer: Troy, Mo.
Your More Eggs surely does the work. I have fed it 30 days to a bunch of 75 hens and pullets. When I started to feed your More Egg tonic I only got from 3 to 6 eggs a day, and now I am gathering 50 and still gaining. No loafers in the bunch. HENRY MUCK.

437 Eggs in 11 Days

E. J. Reefer: Burdett, Kansas
I am surely pleased with More Egg Tonic. I have 75 hens, and have gotten 437 eggs in eleven days. They are laying better every day. MRS. CHAS. MILLER.

This is a concentrated tonic, not a food. It consists of every element that goes toward the making of more eggs. A perfect regulator, aids digestion, stimulates egg production and builds firm bones and strong muscles. The foremost authorities in America and poultry raisers from every state endorse Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

"The Winter Just Ahead of Us May Bring Suffering Infinitely Greater than the War Brought upon Us"

THE above headline is taken from a public statement of President Wilson quoted in an official bulletin issued by the United States Railroad Administration on the twenty-second day of last September. The complete quotation of the President's words reads:

"We have now got to do nothing less than bring our industries and our labor of every kind back to a normal basis after the greatest upheaval known to history, and the winter just ahead of us may bring suffering infinitely greater than the war brought upon us if we blunder or fail in the process. An admirable spirit of self-sacrifice, of patriotic devotion and of community action guided and inspired us while the fighting was on. We shall need all these now, and need them in a heightened degree, if we are to accomplish the first tasks of peace."

Mr. Wilson's warning was fully justified at the time, by the alarming attitude of organized labor manifest in the numerous strikes then in progress and others of incalculable consequences then impending, notable among the latter being the threats of nation-wide strikes by the railroad employees and the bituminous coal miners.

The Coal Strike a Crime

DESPITE the President's appeal and all other efforts to prevent such action the heads of the United Mine Workers' Union have carried their threat into execution by issuing a strike order which called out four hundred thousand miners on November first and closed every unionized soft coal mine from Colorado east. In so doing they have shown more than a wanton disregard of the interests of the public, for they have selected a time when a shortage of coal already existed and with cold weather coming on the closing of the mines would cause the people the utmost suffering, apparently for the purpose of enforcing their demands by the dire distress and necessity of the entire country.

The consequences of a long protracted strike of the coal miners at this time are too horrible to contemplate, involving, as they do, first the general shutting down of the industries on which millions of people depend for employment and earning their living, second a scarcity becoming a dearth of fuel to warm the homes, causing sickness to millions and deaths by thousands, finally paralyzing the railroads and bringing the inhabitants of the large cities to starvation. The President was within bounds in forecasting the suffering as "infinitely greater than the war brought upon us." It can not be allowed and must be prevented—but how?

Government Takes Vigorous Measures to Avoid National Calamity

WITH a full appreciation of the emergency the Government has reinstituted the war-time Fuel Administration for the purpose of conserving what coal there is above ground and apportioning it to the most vitally necessary uses. At once, the Railroad Administration ordered the seizure of sufficient coal to meet the pressing needs of the railroads and then cut down the train service to the smallest practicable minimum.

All these are proper and wise precautionary measures to mitigate so far as possible and for a time the disastrous effects of the cessation of coal production, but ultimately, if the strike is long continued, the worst phases of President Wilson's prediction will be realized. The only remedy, the only adequate relief consists in bringing the strike speedily to an end. For this purpose the Government, acting through the Attorney General, promptly initiated legal proceedings in the United States District Court, at Indianapolis, to compel the heads of the Miners' Union to revoke the strike order, and for the immediate issuance of an injunction to restrain these Union leaders from taking any action in furtherance of the strike pending a hearing and final decision of the case. The court issued the temporary injunction at once and ordered the interested parties to appear for hearing on November eighth.

In pursuing this course the Government does not question the undoubted right of laborers to strike under ordinary circumstances, or in other words, unless they are in duty bound by contract or other legal obligation not to strike. The Government bases its right to invoke the power of the court in this particular case on the grounds, first, that the miners are still bound by their war-time agreement to submit their disputes to arbitration and not to strike until the re-establishment of peace which, though hostilities have been suspended, will not be until the pending peace treaty has been ratified, and second that the officers of the Mine Workers' Union by ordering the strike violated the Federal law which forbids and makes it a punishable crime for two or more persons to conspire or agree to do anything to restrict the production of any necessary article of food or fuel. Thus the Government claims that the coal strike is a crime as well as a breach of contract in a cruel attempt to enforce unreasonable demands by torturing the nation into submission. The strike leaders, against whom the injunction has been issued, have appeared with their counsel in court to contest the case, and after hearing the evidence and arguments, on November eighth the court ordered them to revoke the strike order.

Demands of the Striking Miners

THE striking miners demand a five-day week, a six-hour day and a minimum daily wage of eight dollars. But, as explained by a prominent coal dealer, only five hours of the six-hour day would be spent in actual productive work, the other hour being used in going to and from the place of work. So that what they really propose and insist on is forty dollars pay for twenty-five hours of work a week. Of course the mine operators cannot grant these demands, even if disposed to do so, because the public would not submit to the high price and shortage of coal that would follow as a necessary consequence. The increased burden which the country would have to bear is stated by the same authority as follows:

"The coal miners' demands (if granted) will increase the cost of domestic fuel $2.50 a ton and reduce the annual supply by twenty million tons even though the present annual output of eighty million tons falls short of the country's needs. They will increase the cost of soft coal $1.50 a ton and add two hundred and fifty million dollars to the annual railway deficit—not to mention the added burden upon every public utility and the increased cost of every manufactured article, from pins to automobiles, all of which the public must pay. * * * This is not a blow at capital. It is a blow at every citizen of the country." To quote further from his prediction which was made before the strike order went into effect:

"The mask is off. The issue of the conflict is clear. This is no longer a struggle between labor and capital. The fight is between the United States of America and the American Federation of Labor."

His words were prophetic, as three weeks from the day they appeared in print the Government proceedings, which we have described, were instituted by order of President Wilson and with the approval of the Cabinet. This action called forth vigorous protests on the part of the strike leaders and Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, and the latter even went so far as to hint vaguely that undesirable consequences might result from organized labor's resentment at the court's restraining order. However, the officers of the Miner's Union reluctantly and under protest cancelled the strike order November eleventh. This action is the more creditable to them because, while they were debating whether or not to obey the court's mandate, President Gompers and his Executive Council publicly endorsed the strike and pledged to the miners the full support of the American Federation of Labor. It is reported that many of the miners are returning to work while others refuse to do so. But officers of the Miners' Union have accepted the Government's invitation, issued as soon as the strike was called off, to meet the mine operators with a view to adjusting their differences.

Sustain the Government in Maintaining Law and Order

THEIR demands are preposterous. The world cannot subsist on the products of twenty-five or even thirty hours of work a week, to say nothing of the exorbitant wage. Humanity would starve and freeze on a universal twenty-five hours of work a week. Is this strike the entering wedge, the beginning of a movement for a universal twenty-five hours of work a week, or do these four hundred thousand striking miners expect to be especially favored at the expense, privation and suffering of the rest of the community including the millions of laborers in all other employments? The application of these hours of labor and this scale of wages to farming, the basic industry of all, would so reduce food production that there would not be half enough to feed the population, and the laborers in all other industries would have to go on starvation rations however high their wages, for money is no substitute for a shortage of production and cannot buy what does not exist—witness the present shortage of sugar. Then, too, what would be the prices of food raised at a farm labor cost of forty dollars for twenty-five or thirty hours of work?

The coal miners' proposition is nothing more nor less than one of the phases of Bolshevism which has wrecked Russia. As to the attitude of the miners on the eve of the strike a writer in the New York Tribune, who has visited the coal districts, said:

"They are thirsting for a strike. They desire it as a means of demonstration of their absolute control of bituminous coal production. They desire it as a means of forcing their already determined nationalization of the coal mines. Thousands of them, red-soaked in the doctrines of Bolshevism, clamor for the strike as the means of syndicalizing the coal mines without the aid or consent of government, and even as starting a general revolution in America. The public has no conception of the way in which a large element among the miners has absorbed the Bolshevik economy and theory of soviet control. They are for it in tens of thousands—not as something to come in another generation, but now They see it coming through a nation freezing and starving in the depths of winter."

Please do not misunderstand what we have written as expressing enmity, which we do not entertain, toward labor organizations in general or the American Federation of Labor in particular. The majority of the members of most of the labor unions are good, law-abiding, patriotic citizens, but it is well known that an Anarchist, Bolshevik element, mostly composed of foreigners, is trying to get control of the labor organizations and on some of them has already obtained too strong a grip for the good of the Labor cause or the safety of the country. We appeal to all good citizens to support the Government in the present crisis, and especially to union labor to purge its organizations of the destructive forces that are striving for mastery by unlawful means.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

On a car, going up a steep hill, leading to the Zoological Gardens of Cincinnati, is Violet Draper Huntington. Opposite her sits Wallace Richardson. Nearly at the top of the hill, something beneath the car breaks. Wallace seizes Violet's hands and locking them behind his neck commands her to cling. The car crashes down, burying all the passengers beneath the ruins. They are the only two alive and hurried to Wallace Richardson's home, are cared for by his mother. Mrs. Mencke, Violet's sister provides a nurse and leaves orders for Violet to see no one. The nurse out for a walk, Violet goes to the adjoining room to meet Wallace and thank him for the life saved. As they become more friendly, Wallace realizes his danger and Violet is hopelessly in love. Violet asks Wallace to come with his mother to see her. Mrs. Mencke takes Violet to Saratoga for two months, then to Cincinnati, and home. The following day, picking up a paper, Violet reads of Mrs. Richardson's death. She goes to the Richardsons' house and expresses her sympathy to Wallace, who unconsciously calls her my darling, and asks her forgiveness. As she whispers, "I am glad," he knows she is all his own. Returning home, her sister demands where she has been, and learning it was at Mrs. Richardson's funeral, that she rides in the carriage with Wallace and Mrs. Dent, Mrs. Mencke denounces it as questionable and that she must drop him for all time. Wallace, calling upon Violet, Mr. and Mrs. Mencke return and she introduces him and admits he is her promised husband. She overhears Belle's and her husband's scheme to place her in a convent. Mrs. Mencke, proposing a trip to Montreal, Violet refuses to go, and Mrs. Mencke takes Mrs. Hawley, who is to sail for Europe and chaperone Nellie Bailey, into her confidence and requests her to induce Violet to join them. Violet makes ready for the proposed trip and Wallace is at the steamer to say good by. Vane Cameron and Ralph Henderson join Mr. and Mrs. Hawley's party and before the voyage is over Vane Cameron surrenders his heart to Violet. Mrs. Mencke schemes that no letters pass between Violet and Wallace and later, joining the party in Europe, gives her permission for Vane to win Violet. Failing to get Violet's consent, she produces a notice of Wallace Richardson's death, which throws Violet into a severe sickness, leaving her sad and heartbroken. Vane Cameron, receiving an encouraging letter from Mrs. Mencke, appears, and tells Violet the wish nearest his heart is to make her his wife. Violet confesses to Vane her love for Wallace Richardson, her sister's opposition, concealing nothing. Knowing she is unhappy from causes other than Wallace's death, Vane urges her to allow him to give her his name, to shield her from sorrow and care. Violet, afraid to yield, and hesitating, faints. Ringing a bell, Mrs. Mencke enters. Recovering consciousness, Violet questions did she promise, and being assured by her sister that she has, she faints again. Mrs. Mencke informs Lord Cameron that Violet acknowledges the engagement, and later she consents to what he thinks best, but with many misgivings. Mrs. Mencke, entering Violet's room, finds the bed made and the room in order and no trace discovered of her. Four weeks later, Lord Cameron, returning from a fruitless search, sees a group near a cliff and the body of a woman upon the beach, clad in dark grey suit with bands of blue silk. Believing it is Violet, Lord Cameron selects a spot near the sea. The next day a stranger appears and requests to meet the woman reported to have married Lord Cameron. Being questioned by the Menckes his right, his answer thrills all—"the most sacred right in the world, for—she is my wife!" Wilhelm Mencke doubting the marriage, Wallace produces the marriage certificate and Vane Cameron confirms it by Violet's admission of it to him. Then he relates her loyalty to Wallace, her unhappiness, the treatment received, her disappearance and later the finding of her body by drowning and the burial. Wallace falls unconscious and Lady Cameron and Vane remain with Wallace through a severe illness. Riding through the crowded streets, Wallace catches the glimpse of a face, looking from a coach window, which unmans him. Vane consoles him with what he knows. Wallace returns to New York, building up a fine business. In the meanwhile, Wilhelm Mencke squanders all at the gaming table and Mrs. Mencke returns to Cincinnati from which place she suddenly disappears. The night of Violet's flight she meets a peasant girl, Lisette Vermilet, fleeing from a forced marriage and they exchange clothing. Lisette, leaving Violet, and still dark, rushes on at a headlong speed, loses her balance and falls over a projecting cliff into the sea. The body found later, and not recognizable, is by the clothing supposed to be Vane Cameron's promised bride. Violet returns to New York, securing a position as governess for Bertha Lawrence, who is partially blind and possessed of a strong will.

CHAPTER XXI.

AN UNEXPECTED MEETING.

VIOLET'S tactics proved very successful with her pupil, and while she had many anxious and weary moments, and had to practice the greatest patience and self-control in the management of the unruly child, she felt such an overwhelming pity for the motherless girl, such tenderness for her in her affliction, that it helped her to be sweet and kind even when she had to be most firm, and it was not long before she had her under complete control. The two were the best of friends in a short time, and Mr. Lawrence looked upon Violet as an elder daughter and treated her as such. Her influence wrought a great change in Bertha's character, helping to make her life brighter and happier, and transforming her from a spoiled, discontented, miserable girl into a pleasant, lovable little companion.

One day while her pupil was paying some visits with her father, Violet took advantage of their absence to do some shopping, and after having made her purchases she walked leisurely along the street enjoying her liberty, occasionally stopping to look at the goods displayed in the shop windows, pausing now and then to admire the pictures in some art store, and greatly diverted as she went by watching the busy, hurrying throng.

On and on she walked, taking no note of time or distance, until something prompted her to turn into a wide and more quiet street on her left, and she wended her way slowly along, thinking how strange it was to be there in New York and not know a single person, among its million of people, save those with whom she was living.

"It is almost like being an alien in a strange land," she murmured, a little sadly, while, for the first time during her residence there a slight feeling of homesickness came over her.

She had noticed in turning the corner that there was a large church near by, and she had thought to walk past it and ascertain if possible what denomination worshiped there.

As she came opposite its spacious entrance she observed that some one was sitting upon one of the steps and leaning against a pillar.

A second glance told her that it was a man—heavy in form, gross in appearance, shabbily dressed, while he reclined there motionless, with his hat pulled far over, and mostly concealing his face.

Violet thought that he must be intoxicated and was probably sleeping off the effect of his potations, but just as she was passing him he lifted his hat and glanced sleepily at her out of his bleared and swollen eyes.

The effect of that glance was electrical, for the next moment he had sprung to his feet, a fearful imprecation bursting from his lips, his face, which but a minute before had been of a dusky red, suddenly blanching to the pallor of death, while he trembled visibly in every limb.

"Girl! Girl! Who, in Heaven's name, are you?" he demanded, in a hoarse, unnatural voice.

Violet had not recognized him until he spoke; but now, with a sinking heart and a feeling of intense disgust, she saw that she was face to face with Wilhelm Mencke, her sister's husband, who, it was evident, had become a sot, and, if appearances did not deceive her, almost a beggar since she last saw him.

"Who are you? Who are you?" he cried again, in a shrill, quavering voice, a look of fear and dread almost convulsing his features.

He afterward confessed that he believed himself to have been attacked with delirium tremens and haunted by Violet's ghost.

"I am Violet," the startled girl at last found voice to say.

"You lie!" the man cried, cowering before her as if she had struck him a blow; then he added, in an awed, husky whisper: "Violet is dead."

"Dead!" repeated Violet, wonderingly.

"Yes, dead—and buried. I saw her laid in her grave with my own eyes," he reiterated, his staring eyes still riveted upon her face.

"That is not possible, Wilhelm," Violet answered. "I ran away from you and Belle because I did not wish to marry Lord Cameron; but I did not die. I went directly to Paris."

The man was shaking as with an ague fit; his eyes were still frightfully wild, his whole attitude betraying excessive terror.

"No, no," he muttered, "Violet was buried at Mentone—I saw her—I know it!"

"You are mistaken, Wilhelm," Violet returned, as she began to have some inkling of the truth; "if any one is dead—if you have buried any one believing it to be me, it must have been that poor girl with whom I exchanged clothing."

"Ha! What is that you say?" cried the man, with a start, and recovering himself somewhat at this statement, while he drew a little nearer his sister-in-law. "What 'poor girl' do you mean?"

"A peasant girl who was also running away from an unhappy home and a cruel father," Violet explained. "We met on the road not far from Mentone, and she told me her story. I was so afraid of being seen and recognized that I persuaded her to let me have her costume in exchange for mine. Can it be that she is dead!" the young girl concluded, sorrowfully.

"If what you tell me is true, it must have been that girl," Mr. Mencke replied, pleased with the discovery that he was not a victim of delerium tremens and that Violet was not a spirit.

"How did she die?" she inquired, her mind still upon the unfortunate peasant girl, while tears started to her eyes at her sad fate.

"Drowned," Wilhelm Mencke said, laconically.

"Poor Lisette! How could it have happened?" cried Violet, in a horrified tone and growing very pale at the intelligence.

"She probably made a misstep on the cliffs and tumbled into the ocean," explained Mr. Mencke. "Her body was found four weeks afterward, but it was so disfigured it could not be recognized, save by the clothing, which we knew was yours, and so of course concluded it must be you."

Violet shuddered. It seemed a horrible fate, and yet it might have been hers. She wondered how she had managed to escape falling from those perilous cliffs as she made her way over that strange road in the darkness.

"Where is Belle?" she asked, with some reluctance, after a few moments of sad thought.

"The devil knows—I don't," snapped the man, angrily, a heavy scowl disfiguring his face.

Violet looked both astonished and disgusted at this rude reply.

"What do you mean, Wilhelm?" she asked, gravely, "and why do I find you here in such a plight?" glancing over his soiled and threadbare apparel.

He laughed disagreeably at the question.

"You see me looking like a beggar because I am one," he answered, roughly.

"What do you mean?" she repeated.

"I am dead broke—that is all," sullenly.

"Do you mean that you have lost all your money and—mine, too?" Violet demanded, wonderingly.

"Every dollar of it."

"How?"

The man laughed uneasily, but, with an air of bravado, he made first a motion as if he were shaking and throwing dice, then as if shuffling cards, and she knew that he had gambled it away.

"What did you mean by saying that you do not know where Belle is?" Violet inquired, without making any comment upon the loss of her property, though she was astonished to learn that it was all gone.

"Just what I said," Wilhelm Mencke responded, gruffly. "When she found I'd made way with all the money she denounced me in language more expressive than agreeable; said she never wanted to look upon my face again, and much more of the same sort; so I took her at her word, cleared out, and haven't seen her since."

"When was that?" Violet asked.

"Last December."

"Where were you then?"

"In London."

"Do you think it probable that she has returned to America?"

"I cannot say. I only know that she made it so hot for me that I wanted to get into a cooler atmosphere, and so I vamoosed," the man returned, with a shrug of his huge shoulders and a suggestive leer. "I don't care if I never see her again," he added, with an oath.

Violet regarded him with more and more of repugnance—indeed, she was half afraid of him, in his present state, and wondered how it was possible for any one to fall so low in so short a time.

"Well, you've catechized me pretty thoroughly; now suppose you answer a few questions yourself," he remarked, drawing nearer to her, his fear having all vanished upon discovering her to be of real flesh and blood instead of an apparition. "When did you come to New York?"

"Last October."

"Where were you between May and October?"

"Most of the time in Paris."

"What were you doing there?"

"Studying music and French."

"Hadn't you had enough of that lingo?" sneered Wilhelm Mencke, who affected to despise the "chattering French people." "And where did you get money to pay your bills?"

"I had saved it from my allowance," said Violet.

"What was your object in studying there?"

"To fit myself for a teacher, so that I could take care of myself, for I never intended to go back to you and Belle."

"You didn't, eh? Why not, pray?" he demanded, flushing.

"Because you were not kind to me," Violet said, tremulously, as a flood of painful memories rushed over her.

"Humph! What in thunder made you run away from that chap you promised to marry?" the man asked, sharply. "Instead of having to work for your own living you would now be occupying one of the finest positions in England."

Violet's face grew very pale and sorrowful.

She could never recall those sad incidents and trials of her life without experiencing pain.

"Yes," she said, thoughtfully, "I know that; but I know also that I should have been guilty of doing Lord Cameron the greatest wrong possible; so I ran away because Belle was determined that I should marry him, and there was no other way of escaping from such a fate."

"But you promised him that you would marry him, and it was a shabby trick to break it and run away from him at the last moment."

"I do not think I ever did really promise," Violet said, thoughtfully. "It was more than half Belle's doings, and I was drawn into it before I was aware of it. At any rate, I felt that I should be committing sin——"

"Against whom—your old lover?" sneered Wilhelm Mencke, eying her keenly.

"Oh, no; for Wallace is dead, you know," Violet answered, sadly, but flushing slightly as she thought that he did not know of the sacred bond that had united them, "but I did not love Lord Cameron, and he was too good a man to be hampered with a loveless wife; so I thought it was better to run away at the last moment than to perjure myself and ruin his life."

Her companion eyed her keenly during this speech. It was evident to him that she had not yet learned the truth about Wallace being alive.

He did not intend to undeceive her regarding his supposed death, for he thought perhaps he might yet make profitable use of the fact of his existence, if he should ever meet the young man again.

"So you are really earning your own living?" he remarked, changing the subject and running his eye critically over her neat, trim figure, while his fat shoulders shook with amusement at the idea; for in the old days in Cincinnati she had never been required to do anything for herself.

"Yes," Violet said, briefly.

"You look as if you fared pretty well, too," he added. "What are you doing?"

"Teaching. Do you suppose Belle has gone home to Cincinnati?"

The young girl suddenly and purposely changed the subject, for she did not wish to tell him any more about herself if she could avoid it.

"I don't know—nor do I care," the man returned, gruffly, and completing his sentence with some observation not very complimentary to Mrs. Mencke.

Violet flushed indignantly at his coarseness, but made no reply to it.

"Where are you teaching?" he inquired, persistently going back to that subject; "in the public schools?"

"No; I am giving private lessons in French and music," Violet said after a moment of thought, and not thinking it necessary to tell him what else she was doing.

"Where do you live?"

Violet hesitated; but at length she said, boldly: "I would prefer not to tell you, Wilhelm. I have broken away altogether from my old life, and I have no desire to renew its former associations. It is a hard thing to say, perhaps, but you and Belle both have alienated yourselves of my affections by your unkind treatment. I sometimes think it is very strange—it does not seem as if an own sister could treat one so."

A peculiar gleam shot into Wilhelm Mencke's eyes at this and his lips parted as if he were about to speak, but he checked himself; and Violet, not noticing it, went on:

"You say that people believe me to be dead—let them continue to think so; I am happier as I am, living among comparative strangers and in the independence of self-support, and I am doing no one any wrong by keeping my existence unknown. If you are living here in New York, I hope we shall not meet again, and I do not wish you to try to discover my abode. I no longer owe you any obedience, for you have forfeited all right to any authority over me by your unkindness and the squandering of my property, and, though I suppose I might call you to account for it, I have no desire to do so. I simply ask you to let me alone."

CHAPTER XXII.

"I'LL HUNT YOU OUT YET."

The man flushed angrily at her reply.

"Humph! You are ashamed of your brother because he happens to be down in the world just now."

"Your simply 'being down in the world,' as you express it, Wilhelm, would not make me 'ashamed' of you; but if you have gambled away all your money, as well as mine, as you have led me to infer, I certainly cannot depend upon you for future support; while, if you are leading a life of dissipation, as your appearance indicates, I think it will be better for us not to meet," Violet answered, somewhat coldly.

"You ——— saucy minx," he began, fiercely, "you shall tell me where you live," and he laid a heavy hand upon her shoulder.

"I shall not tell you anything more about myself, and you can release me at once, or I shall appeal to that policeman yonder," Violet said, calmly and resolutely.

She glanced at an officer who was pacing back and forth, down by the corner of the street, as she spoke.

Doubtless Wilhelm Mencke knew that she would be as good as her word, for his hand dropped by his side, though an angry oath escaped him at her obstinacy, while he affirmed that "he would yet ferret her out."

Then he moderated his tone all at once, and asked, in a sort of shamefaced, appealing way:

"Do you happen to have a little money that you can spare me, Violet? I am deucedly hard up this morning."

A curl of scorn wreathed the girl's beautiful lips at this unmanly request, but she quietly drew forth her purse, and taking a five-dollar bill from it, passed it to him.

His eyes gleamed greedily as he grasped it and shoved it into the depths of a pocket.

Then he turned and began to shuffle off, remarking that "he was dry and guessed he would go and get a glass of beer."

He stopped after he had gone a few steps, however, and looking over his shoulder, remarked, with a malicious leer:

"You may imagine that you are cute enough

Address MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

THERE were so many interesting letters this month that it was disappointing to be told that there were so many of equal interest left over that there wouldn't be space for only a few new ones in December. Then came the difficulty of selecting them. I thought to myself, "That letter from Mrs. Auld has just naturally got to be published for it may mean a better Christmas for some lonely soldier or sailor boy, and Auntie Wood's mustn't be left out, and the letter from S. C. Sheppard must surely be printed." It isn't often we have a letter from such a mighty hunter and besides, S. C. is a poet and who knows but what he may favor us with some more of his nature verses. I believe in encouraging youthful talent. Then there are the letters giving advice and sympathy to "Wife in Name Only" and last but not least there are the babies, bless em! There are eleven, nice, fat, dimply, smiling babies whose pictures I want to appear this month but I don't dare hope for such good fortune. The powers that be will decree that not more than two or three can be used. But I am sure if the editor should ever place the whole eleven photographs in a row, as I did, he would print every picture. Right then and there I decided that eleven babies were not too many for any one family to have, but just think of buying Christmas presents for eleven children! That's what I must be doing—not for eleven children, but enough so that the only thing I can give my friends will be my sincere wishes for a Merry Christmas, and since, through the years we have worked together, the COMFORT Sisters have come to be real folks to me and are counted among my friends, just consider that it means you when I say Merry Christmas.—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been a COMFORT reader for twenty-five years. I am sending my boy's photograph. His name is Clark and he is nine months old. I should like to see him smiling at me from COMFORT's pages. I wouldn't do without my magazine no matter what the price was.

With love, MRS. ALICE WILLHOITE.

Mrs. Willhoite.—You won't be the only person to be glad when your baby smiles out at the world from COMFORT's pages. We consider it an honor to have him with us and when I looked at his picture I said, "Are there any more at home like you?"—Ed.

OAKLAND, 3740 Emerson St., CALIF.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

We are nearing the holidays and if I don't get in a word now I can't expect to do so before Christmas so just hitch your chairs over a bit and make room for a caller from the Old Pine Tree State, a genuine downeast Yankee, whom fate transplanted into California some years ago. First of all (now keep right on with your knitting, I like to hear the click of the needles), since I am just a short ride from San Francisco and can see its lights from my windows, I thought perhaps I might be a proxy mother to some of your boys in the U. S. Service, Army, Navy or Marine, at the holidays. Some of your dear ones aren't to be discharged for quite a while yet and are perhaps lonely for the grip of mother's hands or the companionship of sisters and brothers. Many are church and Sunday School boys back home but take little interest in attending a strange church in a strange city. "Where the boys in uniform all look alike and go to church in herds and never get to really know anyone," as one dear fellow said to me recently. As my own dear boy wore his country's uniform for more than three years, I have tried to play mother to all the soldiers I have met, knowing from the experience of my own son just how lonely they are and how everyday-alike their life in camp soon becomes. For more than three years there has been no week in which some other mother's boy didn't have a little visit with me and Sundays have been enjoyable, to me at least, as I have had many dear ones, far from home and loved ones, to take to church with me. If any of you have a dear one near or in San Francisco or one among the sick or wounded in Letterman Hospital, Presidio, San Francisco, I want name and address in full and will see to it that they will feel they

WITH the revival of the sugar shortage the sugar-saving recipes will come into their own again, if indeed they have ever abdicated in favor of before-the-war recipes that called so recklessly for one, two and three cups of sugar. What we have done we can do again and our Christmas dinner need be none the less merry because we have used molasses, honey or corn syrup for our Christmas pudding for, after all, it is the Christmas spirit that makes it the day of days, and that is one thing still within the control of individuals, so let us be merry.—Ed.

CREAM OF CELERY SOUP.—Take the outer stalks of celery and wash well and cut into inch lengths; put into sauce-pan, cover with boiling water and cook until tender. Drain and save the water in which they are cooked. Mash the celery through a coarse sieve, return to water and boil fifteen minutes; then strain into double boiler. To each cup of celery add one cup of milk; season with salt and pepper and thicken with flour moistened with water to smooth paste. Add a piece of butter and let cook for a few minutes longer.

OLD-FASHIONED CREAM PIE.—Cream one third cup of butter, add one cup of sugar and cream again. Add one well-beaten egg, one teaspoon of flavoring, and with the eggbeater beat the mixture well. Mix together two even cups of sifted flour, one teaspoon of cream of tartar and one half teaspoon of soda and sift again. Measure one cup of milk and add it alternately to the egg mixture with the flour. Beat hard, and bake in three thin round cakes in a moderate oven. The oven for thin layer cakes should be a little hotter than for loaf cake.

CREAM FILLING.—Have boiling hot two cups of fresh milk. Beat two eggs until creamy and then beat in half a cup of sugar and a pinch of salt. In a sauce-pan melt one tablespoon of butter and slowly add two tablespoons of dry flour and stir until thoroughly smooth. Add slowly the boiling hot milk while continually stirring and when well mixed, pour it over the egg and sugar, stir and return to boiler and cook about seven minutes. When both cake and cream are cold, flavor the cream and spread it between the layers of cake. If desired, the pie may be frosted and decorated with half walnut meats of jelly.

ROAST TURKEY.—After cleaning and washing turkey thoroughly place it in roaster, having first rubbed the entire surface with salt, pepper and flour rubbed to a paste and mixed with butter. Place in hot oven until it begins to brown, then baste. For basting use a cup of boiling water to which a quarter cup of bacon fat has been added. Use this until there is enough fat from the bird to baste with. Cook about three hours, though time required depends somewhat upon size of turkey. If turkey is browning too fast, cover with buttered paper to prevent burning. Turn frequently.

STUFFING.—Melt one quarter cup butter and pour over one cup of cracker crumbs which have been seasoned with salt, pepper, sage and a little onion. Moisten with one egg, well beaten, and add enough scalded milk to make it the right consistency.

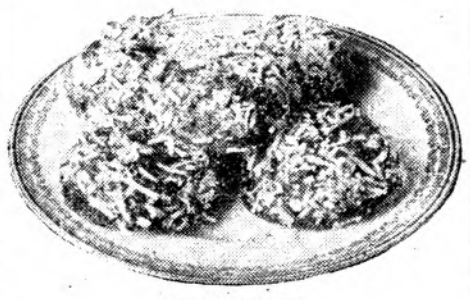
GIBLET GRAVY.—To the fat in the pan add three tablespoons of flour and stir until free from lumps. To this add the stock in which the giblets have been cooked and enough boiling water to make it the desired consistency. Chop giblets into small pieces and add.

SCRAMBLED EGGS.—Five eggs, one half cup milk, one half teaspoon salt, one eighth teaspoon pepper, two tablespoons butter. Beat eggs slightly with silver fork; add salt, pepper and milk. Heat omelet pan, put in butter, and when melted, turn in the mixture. Cook until of creamy consistency, stirring and scraping from bottom of the pan.

STEAMED EGGS.—Put one or two tablespoons of new milk in plain patty tins, and break fresh eggs into them; add a little salt and put into the steamer and steam while white, over the yolks, but not long enough to harden them. Eggs thus prepared are very nice and look very inviting.—MRS. MIKE MATHISON, Moorhead, R. R. 4, Box 44, Iowa.

STEAMED PUDDING.—Two cups rye flour, one half teaspoon salt, one half teaspoon soda, one half cup chopped nuts, one half cup chopped raisins, one half cup molasses, one half cup sour milk, one quarter teaspoon each cinnamon, cloves, nutmeg and ginger and two tablespoons melted shortening. Mix dry ingredients together, then add others in order. Steam one and one half to two hours, in well-greased moulds. Serve with hard sauce.

HARD SAUCE.—Cream one quarter cup of butter until very light and gradually work in two thirds of a cup of powdered sugar, a little cinnamon and orange juice.

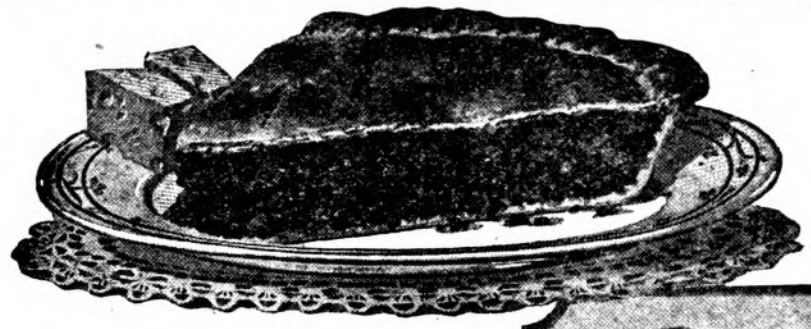


EGGLESS FRUIT CAKE.—One half cup of lard or butter, two thirds cup of sugar, one cup of raisins, two thirds cup of sour milk, one half teaspoon salt, one half teaspoon all kinds of spices, one teaspoon soda and enough flour to make batter thick enough to drop from spoon.—MRS. P. M. HARRELL, Wheatland, Ind.

BUTTER SCOTCH.—Three quarters cup molasses, one cup sugar, two tablespoons vinegar, two tablespoons hot water and one half cup butter. Boil until brittle when tried in cold water. Turn into buttered tins and cut into squares.

CREAM CANDY.—One cup sweet cream, two cups granulated sugar, two thirds teaspoon cream of tartar. Do not stir while cooking. Cook half an hour, remove from stove and beat well. Add nuts and flavoring and work candy into a roll and slice.

PRALINES.—Two pounds brown sugar, one half cup butter, one cup milk, one tablespoon vinegar. Boil until it will thread. Flavor with vanilla, add chopped nuts and beat until creamy.



COCOANUT DROPS.—Two cups of freshly grated cocoanut, or the shredded cocoanut soaked in milk and drained until dry, one tablespoon of flour mixed with one cup of sugar, and one egg-white beaten until stiff and dry. Stir all together and drop in spoonfuls on buttered paper. Sift sugar over the top, and add a little coccanut if desired. Bake in a slow oven about fifteen minutes. They should be lightly browned on top and bottom.

TAFFY.—Two cups sugar, one cup water. Let boil and add two tablespoons vinegar, and piece of butter size of walnut. Let cook until it will harden in cold water. Add flavoring and remove from fire. Let cool and then pull.—EDITH DEARING, Velpen, Ind.

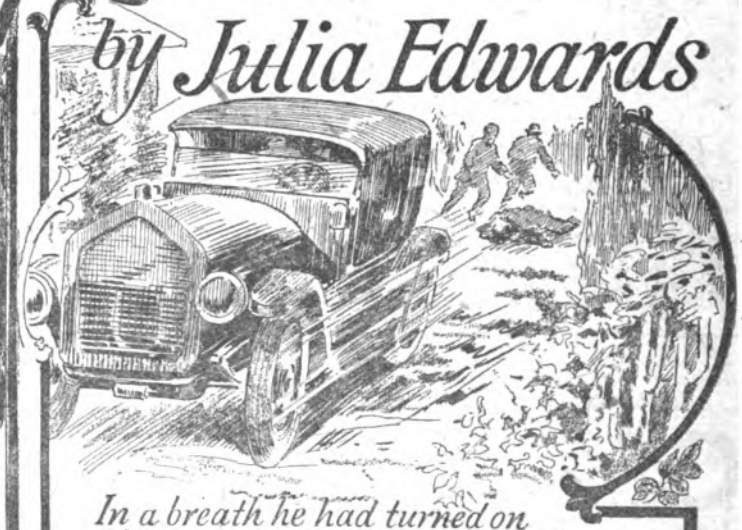
Driven Apart

by Julia Edwards



The rancher was carrying a salver containing a pitcher and two glasses.

"This happened about the middle of the afternoon, you say?"

The woman however did not move from the road.

In a breath he had turned on the power, and set the throbbing mechanism in motion.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Nicholas Berdyne, past middle age, his face marred by dissipation, schemes with Hartley Trenwyck to win Beryl Grayson, whose father is dead. She is engaged to Neil Preston, who goes to Alaska in the interest of a mine owned by Grayson and which falls into Berdyne's hands. Neil Preston is reported dead by Dave Gorsline, who is hired by Berdyne to tell Beryl. In her sorrow and loss of wealth, she refuses continued aid from Berdyne. Mr. Jackman from Denver, wanting to repay a debt owed to Beryl's father, invites Beryl to his ranch, where she forms a friendship for Tonita, a beautiful Mexican girl, who advises her not to marry Berdyne through any mistaken idea of gratitude. Irma Lee, discarded by Berdyne, warns Beryl that he serves his own selfish purpose and that Neil Preston lives and is on his way to Jackman's Ranch. Berdyne, persistent that Beryl shall become his wife, Neil Preston, overhearing her denunciation of his baseness and treachery and refusing to marry him, confronts Berdyne who swears he will follow his trail. The day Beryl Grayson becomes Berdyne's wife, Morley Preston, opposed to Neil's marriage, will tender Trenwyck a check for five thousand dollars and Berdyne will give a like sum. He admits Beryl's trust in Jackson and that the letter written offering her the home was inspired by him, that he holds a heavy mortgage on the Jackman ranch, and with this knowledge they plot to separate the lovers who plan to be married the following day.

HAPTER VII.

THE FAITHLESS FRIEND.

"YOU are happy, Beryl?"

Mr. Jackman came into the sitting-room where Beryl, her lovely face radiant with joy, was moving about, collecting some of the books and keepsakes which she had brought with her from Denver. She had been singing, out of the fullness of her heart, but stopped and turned brightly upon the rancher.

"Happy, you ask, Mr. Jackman?" she repeated. "Ah, yes! I believe I am the happiest girl in all the world! Why should I not be? My darling has returned to me, and tomorrow—she blushed like the rose—"tomorrow I am to be his bride."

The rancher was carrying a salver containing a pitcher and two glasses. One of the glasses was filled with a liquid that sparkled ruby-red to the brim. His hands trembled a little as he placed the salver and its burden on a table.

"Ah, well," said he with a short, unnatural laugh, "love is a wondrous thing. What some men will do for it is past all understanding."

There was a quiver in the rancher's strong voice, and he seemed even more ill at ease than when he had met Beryl and Neil on the veranda a few hours before. But Beryl, so completely wrapped up in her own happiness, paid little heed to these visible signs of a strange mood in Mr. Jackman.

"Are you going to miss the melancholy little girl that has been your guest for so long, Mr. Jackman?" she archly asked, sinking into a chair.

"More than I can tell," said he, his eyes wandering under the look she gave him.

"Will Mother Jackman be back before I leave, do you think?"

"I hope not," said he absently.

"You hope not," she repeated, with a bewildered smile.

"I mean," he answered, confusedly, "that I hope you will not leave before she comes. I have come to drink to your happiness in a glass of home-made wine," he went on. "I know you do not care for wine, Beryl, but on this occasion, and since I have drawn it with my own hands from my choicest store, you will not refuse a glass with me?"

Mr. Jackman was English, and whenever he wished to celebrate he must do it with a glass of wine from the small vineyard on the estate. Beryl felt that she could not refuse the slight request.

"It will be my first glass of wine, Mr. Jackman," said she; "but since you have gone to the trouble to get it, I shall not be disobliging."

He brought her the filled glass, then poured another for himself. His hand was unsteady, and he spilled some of the pitcher's contents on the salver.

"Will you give me a toast?" cried Beryl, raising her glass and peering at him with her glancing eyes.

"If your future holds a trace of disappointment," said the grizzled rancher, "may seeming misfortune turn out a blessing in disguise."

It was a queer sentiment, and queerly spoken; but the glasses tinkled together and passed to the waiting lips. The rancher swallowed his wine at a gulp. Beryl drank only half of hers, then set the glass back on the salver.

"I shall never forget your kindness to me, Mr. Jackman," said she.

"Don't speak of it!" exclaimed the rancher, almost harshly.

"A girl has so few trifles than men care for," she said, "that I have nothing to leave with you in the way of a keepsake, but I shall certainly send you a little remembrance from San Francisco."

"Don't bother about me, Beryl," he huskily murmured.

"Oh, but I shall!" she declared with girlish insistence. "This little, gold cross," she went on, untying a bit of ribbon that held the trinket against her white throat, "used to be my mother's. I am going to leave it for Mother Jackman. She will prize it for my sake, I know."

She stepped over to the rancher, and pressed the cross into his hand. His face was like stone, and his eyes, although fixed upon her, did not seem to see her at all.

"Strange," she murmured, picking up an armful of books and pictures, "but I feel dizzy and sleepy. I believe I will go to my room for a while and lie down before I finish packing."

Thereupon she passed out of the apartment, and Jackson could hear her little feet climbing the stairs. Trenwyck came in from an adjacent room.

"Did she drink it?" he whispered.

"Yes," answered the rancher, drearily; "she did not suspect me, because she thinks I am her friend. Trenwyck, that little girl is as pure and innocent as she is beautiful. God help me for this day's work!"

"Why, man," murmured the lawyer, clapping him on the back, "it's the best day's work you ever did in your life. You have saved your ranch, and Berdyne will be your friend for all time."

"I have bought my place for a dear price, if my conscience is to pay for it," growled Jackman; "and as for Berdyne, I want none of his friendship, or yours. I have agreed to help you in this contemptible business in order to keep a roof over my head, and you may count on me to do my part as well as I may."

Trenwyck drew back and surveyed him with a basilisk smile.

"Go upstairs and lock her door," said he, coolly, "then give me the key."

CHAPTER VIII.

OUT OF THE SNARE.

Neil Preston returned at the edge of evening in a taxicab. Hurrying up to the front door of the ranch house, Neil gave the bell an impatient pull. Jackman answered the summons in person, and seemed intensely surprised on beholding his visitor.

"Why," he exclaimed, "is that you, Mr. Preston?"

"Certainly," replied Neil, briskly. "You knew I was coming for Beryl, didn't you?"

"But you changed your plans," faltered Jackman, "and sent a note——"

"I sent no note," cried Neil. "Tell Beryl I am here, and waiting."

"But she has gone," said Jackman, in well-feigned consternation. "She left about the middle of the afternoon, bag and baggage, in the automobile you sent for her."

Neil was astounded. A clammy hand seemed gripping his heart and squeezing out every drop of blood.

"Do not trifle with me," he wildly cried. "I sent Beryl no note and I sent no automobile after her. It was the understanding that I was to come for her in person."

"Can this be possible?" muttered Jackman, seemingly aghast. "Why, I found the note on the stairs, where Beryl must have dropped it in her haste. Come in, Mr. Preston. This is something that must be looked into at once."

Neil staggered, rather than walked, into the lighted room. His handsome face had turned pale under its tan, and his dark eyes were wild with anxiety. Jackman gave him the note, which ran thus:

"MY PRECIOUS ONE: I am detained in San Jose. Will you come, without delay, in the motor car I have sent for you? The chauffeur will give you this. With love and kisses, in haste.

"NEIL."

"Heaven help my poor Beryl!" groaned Neil, dropping the paper and covering his face with his hands. "That is not my handwriting, Jackman. It is a trick of Berdyne's."

Only an instant did he give way to his grief, then he leaped at Jackman and caught his arm as in a vise, his eyes fairly gleaming with the fury that ran hot in his veins.

"This happened about the middle of the afternoon, you say?" he demanded.

"Yes."

"And which way did the car go when it left here?"

"Down into the valley, toward town."

Without another word, Neil whirled, dashed from the house, and ran to his waiting vehicle.

"Back to San Jose, chauffeur!" he cried. "Do not spare the car! Speed her up!"

The startled chauffeur turned back along the the tree-lined road, but he had not gone a quarter of a mile before a cloaked figure leaped out into the highway and a woman's voice called: "Stop!"

Neil, who was sitting beside the chauffeur, leaned out of the car.

"Away!" he cried, warningly. "Do not attempt to stop us! An errand, it may be, of life and death calls us on! Open the throttle!" he added.

The woman, however, did not move from the road.

"Is it the Senor Neil Preston to whom I am speaking?" she asked.

"Yes, yes!" he answered. "Who are you? What do you wish?"

"I know whom you are seeking," answered the woman, "and I am almost sure that you are on the wrong course. The welfare of her whom you wish to find is very dear to me, and I beg you, senor, to descend, and grant me a short interview."

"Wait here, driver," said Neil, and sprang to the ground.

The woman retreated a little way among the trees, and Neil hastened to join her.

"Senor," said the woman, speaking rapidly, and laying an eager hand on Neil's arm, "I am Tonita Morales, Beryle's friend. Perhaps she has told you of me?"

"Yes, yes," returned Neil, his agony throbbing in the very tones of his voice. "Beryl spoke of you when I saw her this morning. What do you know? Oh, tell me quickly."

"I called to see Beryl," said Tonita; "it was almost noon, at the time, and Mr. Jackman told me Beryl had gone."

"At noon, you say?" repeated Neil; "and Jackman told you, at that time, that Beryl had gone?"

"Yes, senor."

"Why, he just told me that Beryl had not left until the middle of the afternoon!"

"Ah," said the girl, with a shrug, "his stories do not hang together! There is a mystery here—I have felt so, all the time. But listen to me, senor, for I am not done. After hearing what Senor Jackman had to say, I started back toward home, grieving in my heart that my dear friend should go away without one word to her Tonita, who loves her so dearly. I thought that, perhaps, she had left a letter for me in her room, and I went back. I could not see Senor Jackman, nor any one else, so I went into the house and up the stairs. Senor, the door of Beryl's room was locked! Why should it be locked if she was not there?"

Neil's brain was fairly whirling. Indeed, as Tonita had said, there was a mystery; but would he be warranted in delaying his pursuit of Berdyne to return to the ranch house and make an investigation? A quick decision was required, and everything might depend on the correctness of it.

"I will go back," muttered Neil. "Heaven grant that I may find my poor darling, and that the course I am taking is the right one."

"Stay one moment, Senor," breathed Tonita excitedly. "Are you armed? You may be going among foes."

"I have my two hands," answered Neil, "and they will suffice."

"I would leave the taxi, senor," the Mexicana counseled. "Make your return a surprise, and, perhaps, you may discover something."

The advice seemed good, and Neil ordered his chauffeur to remain where he was. The man was a stranger; if Neil had known him to be trustworthy he would have taken him along. As it was, the chauffeur, very much astonished at all these proceedings, drove out of the road among the trees, and settled himself to wait until he should receive further orders.

Tonita accompanied Neil, almost running to keep abreast of him. Just as they were approaching the house, the sound of an automobile was wafted to their ears from down the road. The car was approaching rapidly, and they were compelled to draw aside into the shadow of the trees to let it pass.

There was but one passenger in the car; they caught a fleeting glimpse of him as he flew by—a dim, almost indistinguishable figure in front, bending over the steering gear.

Neil's attention became riveted upon the car.

"See," he whispered, hoarsely, "the automobile has come to a stop in front of the ranch house! Yes," he added, his voice tense with excitement, "and the man is getting out; the front door of the house opens, and some one emerges carrying—— Ah, Heaven," he finished, with a gasp, "it is Beryl, Beryl!"

This was indeed true. Evidently the coming of the automobile was expected, for no sooner had the man got down from the car than another man emerged from the house with Beryl in his arms.

"That you, Trenwyck?" called the man by the car.

"Yes," answered the other.

"Everything all right?"

"Here is the girl, Nick, and what more do you want?"

"Make haste, then, for we have not a moment to lose!"

Neil Preston waited for no more. Without a sound, but with fierce determination expressed in his every movement, he dashed forward through the gloom, Tonita hastening after him.

Berdyne and Trenwyck, busily engaged with the work that engaged them, were heedless of that grimly vengeful figure gliding to Beryl's rescue. Trenwyck, with Berdyne's aid, lifted the unconscious girl into the tonneau.

At that instant, Neil dashed around to the front of the machine. Then, and not until then, were the two scoundrels conscious of his presence.

A startled oath dropped from Berdyne's lips. Trenwyck leaped back with a cry of dismay.

"Careful, senor!" panted Tonita, who had just reached the scene. "The man has a weapon!"

The moonlight glimmered on a bit of steel in Berdyne's hand.

"Monster," cried Neil, as one of his hands leaped out through the gloom; "once more I have saved my loved one from your treacherous designs. Another attempt, and your base life will pay the forfeit!"

Berdyne, struck down by a terrible blow, lay disarmed in the dust of the road, unable to speak or to move. Trenwyck had retreated out of harm's way, shouting loudly for Jackman.

Doors in the house began to open and close, forms emerged, and there were sounds of running feet.

"Into the car with you, Tonita," cried Neil. "We must use the automobile if we would escape."

While Tonita, obeying instantly, climbed through the open door in the side of the vehicle, Neil leaped to the driver's seat. In a breath he had turned on the power, and set the throbbing mechanism in motion. From his heart he thanked Heaven that he knew the management of an automobile.

Away they glided into the patches of moonlight that drifted through the trees at the roadside and flecked the way before them. From the ranch house came shouts and cries which died to silence as the distance lengthened.

Neil slackened speed as he neared the place where the taxicab and driver were waiting and called to the chauffeur to follow with his machine.

The taxicab crawled out from the trees and followed the Red Flyer. When they had proceeded in this fashion beyond danger of immediate pursuit, Neil paid the chauffeur liberally and dismissed him.

Never before had a lover rescued his loved one so bravely; never before were miscreants so neatly foiled.

To the northward lay the beautiful city of the Golden Gate. There lay Neil Preston's goal, and he would not stay or tarry until he reached it, and had made his peerless sweetheart his wife.

Yet, high over the beautiful valley as they raced along, towered the sinister height of Mount Hamilton, overshadowing them, and still portentous of the evil days that were almost at hand. For that was the night of the seventeenth of April; another morn, and all Santa Clara Valley, with the devoted city to the north of it, were to be rent and shaken by nature's mighty forces.

And toward this city, as to a haven of refuge, the lovers were fleeing!

CHAPTER IX.

TOWARD THE GOLDEN GATE.

"Where am I? Oh, what has happened to me? Neil, my darling, are we lost to each other again?"

They were Beryl's first words. For almost an hour she had lain in Tonita's arms, bereft of consciousness, yet breathing as sweetly and peacefully as a child. Neil, distraught with anxiety on his sweetheart's account, could not leave the mechanism of the car, which, under his skillful touch, was skimming along the tree-bordered road. The most he could do was to turn an occasional glance behind and ask Tonita, in throbbing tones, how his dear one fared.

Tonita had reassured him again and again, but not until those bewildered words reached his ears did a measure of peace fall to Neil Preston's soul.

"No, my precious one," he cried joyfully, "we are nevermore to be lost to each other, for at the end of this brief journey stands the altar before which we shall be united! Do you feel well, dearest?"

He yearned to take her in his arms, but the demands of the moment held him to his task.

"I can hardly believe that you are with me, darling," breathed Beryl; "and is this—can this be Tonita?"

"Yes, dear," returned the Mexicana, "it is really your Tonita. Your lover has rescued you from your enemies. Ah, 'twas nobly done! Are you feeling at all ill, Beryl?"

"No, only a little dizzy."

She straightened up in her cushioned seat, Tonita supporting her with an arm about her waist.

"What happened, sweetheart?" asked Neil, tenderly.

Not once did he stay the automobile, but held it to its swift pace.

"Let me think, let me remember," murmured Beryl, pressing her hand to her forehead. "Such a change has transpired while I was unconscious that it is difficult for me to recall what happened. Ah, yes," she added, in a moment, "now I remember. I was packing my few belongings,

CHRISTMAS TABLE DECORATION

THE LAND OF SNOW

By Violet Marsh

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

CARRYING out some special scheme of decoration always adds a certain zest and interest to a dinner party which is difficult of achievement in any other way.

"The Land of Snow" here pictured offers many possibilities and is an idea readily carried out by clever fingers. The table is covered with a snowy white cloth, and so far as possible, dishes that have green in their coloring should be used. A miniature fence outlines the center decoration and is constructed from fir or spruce limbs freshly gathered from the woods, as the idea is to represent a bit of the snowy outside at this season when the Yule-log burns within, and the old sun, having entered Capricorn, turns the corner of the winter solstice.

Inside the miniature fence, have a mat of smooth, fleecy cotton. On top of each fence post arrange twigs of green, and any winter berries that may be found will enhance the beauty of the arrangement. The characters inside the fence are dolls dressed for playing in the snow and their costumes should include white mittens. At the end of the dinner the dolls are distributed as gifts.

SURPRISES.

The game being played by the dolls is that old-time one of making a huge snowball. The ball is first shaped from hat wire, covered with white cloth and then with fleecy white cotton. The dolls should be jointed that they may be placed in playful attitudes, each one facing the snow-man. A toy hound is placed at the opening of the enclosure. Further table decorations are white glass candlesticks holding red tapers. If any pretty leaves can be found, use them upon which to place salts and peppers, bonbon dishes, etc. Sprays of partridge vines attached to squares of birch bark make pretty place cards.

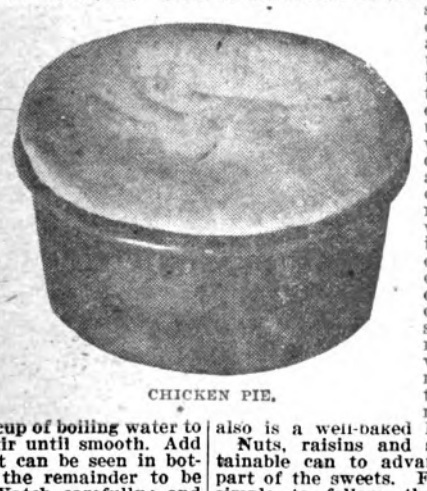
Our Christmas Dinner

The combination of roast goose and game served with currant jelly, cranberry sauce and fried apple still holds its old-time place as the ideal Christmas dinner, and since all kinds of domestic meats have so greatly advanced in price we hear more and more about smothered squirrel, rabbits cooked the same as the old Mammy of the South prepared her platters of savory chicken, and about venison and steamed prairie chicken. With these we must serve the new celery, onions, squash and potatoes if we would taste all the flavors of a real Christmas dinner.

CHRISTMAS CAKE.

ROAST GOOSE.—Singe and remove pin feathers. The skin of the goose contains an excessive amount of oil, which should be drawn out through the skin while cooking so that the meat may retain its fine flavor. For this reason, before any cutting is done, scrub the goose in warm water and a little pure soap that the pores may be opened and cleansed. Make an incision upward from the vent, insert two fingers, loosen and remove any layers of excessive fat. Carefully work the fingers beyond the liver and heart and loosen on either side that the small organs may be removed whole and the gall bladder unbroken. Wash in several clear waters and wipe dry. Stuff with freshly boiled and mashed potato seasoned with salt and pepper, sage, and two boiled onions. Sprinkle generously with salt as this will help draw out the oil from skin. Cook one hour in a moderately hot oven, then drain off the oil, and dredge the goose with flour. Return to oven and as soon as the flour browns, add water and baste frequently until done.

SMOTHERED SQUIRREL.—Skin and remove heads and feet. Make an under incision large enough to thoroughly dress and wash, using a quantity of cold water on the inside. Lay squirrels on their sides in a stew-pan having a closely fitting cover. Sprinkle with salt and pepper and cover with thin slices of bacon. In a sauce-pan put one tablespoon of butter to each squirrel, and into this smooth as many spoons of dry flour as there are butter when the butter begins to bubble. To this add half a cup of boiling water to each spoonful of flour and stir until smooth. Add enough to the squirrels so it can be seen in bottom of stew-pan, reserving the remainder to be added from time to time. Watch carefully; and when the squirrels begin to cook, cover and set back on stove where the gravy will just bubble and cook three hours.



FRICASSEE OF RABBITS.—Skin, clean, and cut into serving portions and roll each piece in flour. In a frying-pan put a liberal amount of butter, or butter substitute, or pork fat which many prefer. When hot, carefully brown each piece of rabbit and remove to stew-pan. In the frying-pan there should be left about a tablespoon of fat to each rabbit, and into this rub as many tablespoons of dry flour, and to this add one and one half cups of boiling water for each rabbit. Cook until smooth, adding a tablespoon of lemon juice, one small sliced onion, three whole cloves, three whole allspice, one scant tablespoon of salt, one scant half teaspoon of pepper, and one bay leaf for every two rabbits, which will serve about six people. Pour all over the rabbits, cover closely and put on back of stove after it begins to cook and very slowly simmer for two hours.

VENISON.—Roasted, it is cooked in a very hot oven the same as beef. Serve with a sauce made from melting currant jelly and adding as much again grape juice. This should be prepared in a double boiler. Just before serving add about one tablespoon of melted butter to every four of sauce.

PRAIRIE CHICKENS.—Wash and draw. Stuff with bread-crumbs seasoned with melted butter, pepper and salt. Steam in a closely covered steamer about one hour. Remove, dredge well with flour, pepper and salt, and quickly brown in a hot oven, basting frequently with melted butter.

CHICKEN PIE.—Draw, and remove any surplus fat from a five-pound chicken or fowl. Wash. Cut into serving portions. Clean the liver, heart and gizzard. Wash and wipe any bloody pieces. Put into a stew-pan and cover with one quart of boiling water. When the contents begin to boil, skim carefully. Mix three rounding tablespoons of flour with a little cold water and slowly stir into the chicken. Add one rounding teaspoon of salt and one scant quarter of a teaspoon of pepper. Cover the stew-pan and set it back where only one side of the contents will bubble and cook at this heat for two hours. If the chicken is not tender, cook a little longer. Add three even tablespoons of butter. Invert a cup in a pie dish and pour in the cooked chicken. Set away to get cold. (It is well to cook the chicken the day before using.)

Make a crust from three and one half cups of flour, one cup of shortening, two teaspoons of salt, three teaspoons of baking powder and one cup of ice water. Mix the dry ingredients together and then sift into mixing bowl. Rub in the shortening, or better still, cut it in with a knife so it will not be softened by the hands. Stir in the ice water with a knife. Turn pastry on floured board and roll to an inch thick; fold and roll again, repeating the process three times. Set in a cold place to harden one hour. Roll to fit the pie dish, making it a little larger. Cover the chicken with the pastry, turning under the edges. Prick the top in several places for the steam to escape and bake in a moderately hot oven about one hour.

CHICKEN PIE.

ONIONS.—Boil whole one hour and if the strong onion flavor is objectionable, change the water once. Drain and season with butter, pepper and salt, or cover with a cream sauce.

SQUASH.—If the squash is watery, it should be cut in halves, the center removed, and baked in a hot oven. Dry squash is steamed. Mash, season with salt and pepper, add a generous amount of butter and serve very hot.

Our Christmas Dinner Trimmings

With the scarcity of sugar, it would seem as if once more we must take care not to go quite to the bottom of the bucket; at least, until more sugar is in sight. Without discussing the situation pro and con, the fact remains that we housewives must turn to our war conservation cookbooks and refresh our memories on ways to use the sugar substitutes if we are to provide our table on Christmas Day with the accustomed sweets. The cakes made with syrup are not just like those made with sugar. In most cases they are less sweet. They do fill an emergency for cake, however. In place of our Christmas pudding we can substitute old-fashioned soft gingerbread, adding raisins and serving with whipped cream. This is a more wholesome dish for the children which will recommend it to mothers, as also is a well-baked Indian pudding.

Nuts, raisins and such fresh fruit as is obtainable can to advantage take the place of a part of the sweets. Following are a few recipes, simple to follow, that will provide confection for the holidays at a small cost:

FROSTED FRUIT.—Beat the white of egg mixed with a teaspoon of ice water until it is frothed. Cut branches of grapes into sections and dip into the egg; drain until nearly dry and roll in pulverized sugar. Roll again in the sugar and lay on paraffin paper to dry.

MINT PASTE.—Soak one envelope of gelatin in quarter of a cup of cold water, and dissolve with two cups of boiling water. Add four tablespoons of strained honey, flavor with a few drops of oil of peppermint and pour into cold wet pans about an inch deep. When cold, cut into squares and dip in powdered sugar.

MAPLE SUGAR FUDGE.—Boil together one large cup of soft maple sugar with one half cup of sweet cream until as the spoon draws through the mixture the bottom of the stew-pan can be seen. Take from fire and beat until it thickens; pour into buttered tin and cut into squares when cold.

FRUIT PASTE.—Melt in a double boiler one cup of currant jelly and one cup of strawberry jam; or any other combination of jam and jelly may be used. Dissolve three tablespoons of powdered gelatine in a little cold water, and add when the jelly and jam are melted. Cook about five minutes, stirring constantly. Wet a shallow pan in cold water and pour in the paste. The following day, cut into cubes and roll in finely ground shredded cocoanut.

WALNUT PATTIES.—Butter a muffin pan and evenly divide one and a half cups of broken walnut meats in the divisions. Boil together two cups of corn syrup and four teaspoons of strong vinegar until it "threads" when slowly poured from spoon. Add one even teaspoon of soda and pour over the walnuts. When cold and hard, remove from pan and wrap in paraffin papers.

STUFFED DATES.—Wash and wipe and remove the stones from dates. Fill cavities with peanut butter and roll in powdered sugar.

CHRISTMAS CAKE.—Cream one cup of butter, add two cups of granulated sugar and cream together until very light. Beat the yolks of six eggs until a light yellow and beat again with the sugar and butter. Dissolve one teaspoon of soda in a little hot water and add this to two cups of thick sour milk. Stir this into the mixture, add one grated nutmeg, one teaspoon of cinnamon and two cups of sifted pastry flour and beat well. Then beat in one and one half cups of shavings of citron dredged in flour, and lastly the whites of six eggs beaten stiff and dry. Do not stir cake after the flour is added, but always use the beating stroke. Bake in a loaf in a moderate oven.

FROSTING.—Cover with boiled frosting made by boiling together one cup of granulated sugar and one third of a cup of hot water until it "threads" when dropped from spoon. Do not stir while boiling. When nearly ready, beat the white of one egg until dry, add a scant quarter of a teaspoon of cream of tartar, and into this, in a very fine stream, pour the boiling syrup, beating continuously. Continue the beating until it thickens and then pour over the cold cake as soon as it will hold without running too much. Around the side of cake outline wishbones with melted chocolate after the frosting is firm. At each end of wishbones press into the frosting a holly berry; also place sprays of holly on top and around the cake.

MINCE MEAT.—Cover two and one half pounds of lean meat with boiling water and slowly simmer until tender. It is well to use a small oval stew-pan that too much water will not be required to cover the meat. When cold, chop the meat fine. Shred and chop fine one pound of fresh beef suet. Chop coarsely five pounds of tart cooking apples. Wash, seed and chop one pound of raisins. Wash and dry one pound each of Sultana and seedless raisins, and one pound of currants. Slice thin one half pound of citron. Mix together two and one half pounds of brown sugar, one even tablespoon of cloves, one tablespoon of allspice, two tablespoons of cinnamon, one grated nutmeg, and one tablespoon of salt. Stir all these ingredients together, add two cups of molasses and five cups of sweet cider and cook slowly until the apple is done. If more acid is desired, add the juice of one lemon and one orange.

INDIAN PUDDING.—Mix together one cup of yellow corn-meal, one cup of molasses and one teaspoon of salt. Over this pour one quart of boiling milk and stir until smooth. Add one tablespoon of butter and one cup of dates cut into small pieces. Pour over three pints of cold milk to which two beaten eggs have been added. Bake in a deep buttered pudding dish about eight hours in a very slow oven. Instead of the dates, raisins or currants may be substituted, or the fruit may be omitted entirely.

SURPRISES.—One cup of sugar and one third cup of butter rubbed to a cream. Beat in one well-beaten egg; add one teaspoon of lemon. Measure two cups of sifted flour, add one half

Fight Film

To Save Your Teeth

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

It is Film that Ruins Them

This is why brushed teeth discolor and decay. And why old methods of cleaning have proved so inadequate.

Your teeth are covered with a slimy film. It clings to them, enters crevices and stays. That film is the cause of most tooth troubles.

The tooth brush does not end it. The ordinary dentifrice does not dissolve it. So, month after month, that film remains and may do a ceaseless damage.

That film is what discolors—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Also of many other troubles.

Dental science, after years of searching, has found a way to combat that film. Able authorities have proved the method by many careful tests. And now, after years of proving, leading dentists all over America are urging its daily use.

Now Sent for Home Tests

For home use this method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And a 10-Day Tube is sent without charge to anyone who asks.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to day by day combat it.

The way seems simple, but for long pepsin seemed impossible. It must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But science has discovered a harmless activating method. And millions of teeth are now cleaned daily in this efficient way.

Let a ten-day test show what this new way means. The results are important, both to you and yours. Compare them with results of old-time methods and you will then know what is best.

Cut out the coupon now so you won't forget.

Cubby Bear Hears Wise Owl's Story

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

WISE Owl hooted three times, long and loud, to call together his pupils, Cubby Bear, Chirpy Chipmunk, Shinyblack Crow and other little woods people who came to his school in the farmer's sugar house.

They were playing tag among the maple trees, but came hurrying in, for they had been promised a story this morning and did not want to miss it.

When all were in their places, Wise Owl put on his large, colored spectacles and smiled at them.

"I have been thinking over many stories which I learned from my ancestors," he told them, "and have decided to tell you about a visitor who came to our forest once upon a time—yes, many visitors, but one stayed longer than the rest."

Chirpy Chipmunk raised his paw and questioned, "How long ago?"

"Many, many moons," said Wise Owl. "Many, many dozens of moons! Now, then, be quiet, and listen: Long—long—long-long ago, to this very forest, came a band of roving Indians, going south."

"What are Indians?" asked Furry Otter.

Wise Owl frowned at the interruption, but answered, "People. Not people like those who live at the farm, or down in the village. The Indians did not live in houses. They wore few clothes. And their skin was not white, but of a dark, reddish color.

"There were many of these Indians, men, women and children, and the animals of the forest were afraid, and all hurried to their homes to hide. Even the birds, though fleet of wing, kept out of the red men's way, hiding in their nests or among the trees, for the Indians had bows and arrows to shoot with."

"What are bozan darrows?" asked Wollie Woodchuck, sleepily, from his corner by the stove.

Wise Owl turned to the wall behind him, and, using a lump of light-colored maple sugar for chalk, drew a picture of a bow and arrow, explaining how they were used.

"Robbie Reddie's great-great-great-great-grandfather," said Wise Owl, solemnly, "was not careful enough to keep out of sight, and had five tailfeathers shot off by an Indian's arrow."

All the pupils turned and looked at Robbie Reddie.

"The Indians stopped all night in our forest," went on Wise Owl, "and built a fire near the spot where the home of Bunny Rabbit now stands. They took fish to eat and water to drink from the Big Brook, and when the night came, they stretched themselves out on the ground, near the fire, and went to sleep. In the night, some of my ancestors, braver than any of the other forest people, went to look at them as they lay sleeping. The men had smeared their faces with red and green and yellow, and wore tall feathers upon their heads. Some of these feathers were dyed with bright colors, too.

"Early in the morning they rose, and after a breakfast of fish, water and some dried meat they had brought with them, they started on their way.

The sky was dark with clouds that morning, with rumblings of thunder in the air, and after the red men had gone, a heavy thunder storm came upon the forest. Thunder rolled r-rip, zip-zip bang! while the lightning flashed around, the wind bent great trees, and rain fell in waves and sheets!"

A wail went up from the Bunny Babies, where they sat in their little cart, near Bunny Rabbit's bench.

"We are afraid!" they sobbed. "We do not like flashy lightning and zippy thunder!"

When Bunny Rabbit had quieted them, Wise Owl went on with his story.

"After the storm had passed, and the sunbeams were trying to dry the drenched forest, and the birds and animals had come out to look about, a startling thing was discovered!

"A small Indian boy had crawled into a thicket of ferns to sleep for the night, and had not wakened when his people went away. Among so many, they had forgotten him, and he was left behind. He was used to being wet, no doubt, and though he may have been lonely and afraid, he did not cry, as a white child would have done.

"The birds and animals were afraid of him at first, but he was small, and alone, and they soon felt sorry for him, and wanted to do something to help him. Squirrels brought nuts from their storehouses, and laid them on the ground near the little Indian boy for him to eat. Then old Mr. Kingfisher caught a fish from the Big Brook, and brought it, all wet and shining, to the child.

"The boy looked around in all directions, getting down on his hands and knees now and then, looking for some trail his friends might have left—trying to find in what direction they had gone. But of course the thunderstorm had blotted out all track or scent of them.

"Then Shinyblack Crow's great-grandfather hit upon a wise plan. He flew away in the direction he had seen the Indians take, and when he came back, next day, he carried in his bill a large green feather which he had pulled from the headdress of an Indian warrior while he lay asleep. It was a brave, brave thing to do!"

Tillie Turtle had been fidgeting about, gnawing her bonnet strings, and showing other signs of excitement, murmuring once or twice, almost under her breath, "My mother told me that story!" and "Yes, yes, that is true!"

Now she tumbled off her bench and went waddling up to Wise Owl's desk.

"It was not a green feather the Crow brought back!" she cried shrilly, pointing at Wise Owl with a skinny claw. "It was a red one! Bright red, the color of the mountain-ash berries!"

Wise Owl stared at her indignantly.

"What do you know about it?" he asked.

"My mother told me the story!" declared Tillie Turtle, "and I say to you, and I say to you all, that that feather was red!"

"It was green!" cried Wise Owl, "and I will not be disputed! Go back to your seat."

"It was red!" persisted Tillie Turtle firmly.

"It was green!" Wise Owl repeated in a loud voice. "I am telling this story, and if you will not be quiet, you are expelled from my school."

"I can go," said Tillie Turtle, marching toward the door, "but I shall stand outside and declare that feather was red, and you cannot drive me away."

The other pupils were looking anxious. They wanted to hear the rest of the story.

Cubby Bear left his seat and went forward.

"Oh, please," he begged, "do not send Tillie Turtle away, and please tell us about the poor little Indian!"

"I will not be disputed when I am teaching school!" declared Wise Owl, his feathers rumply with anger.

"My own mother told me——" began Tillie Turtle.

"Oh, please," said Cubby Bear, "couldn't you both be right about it? Couldn't the feather have been green and red?"

Tillie Turtle and Wise Owl looked at each other. Both felt a litle ashamed of their temper.

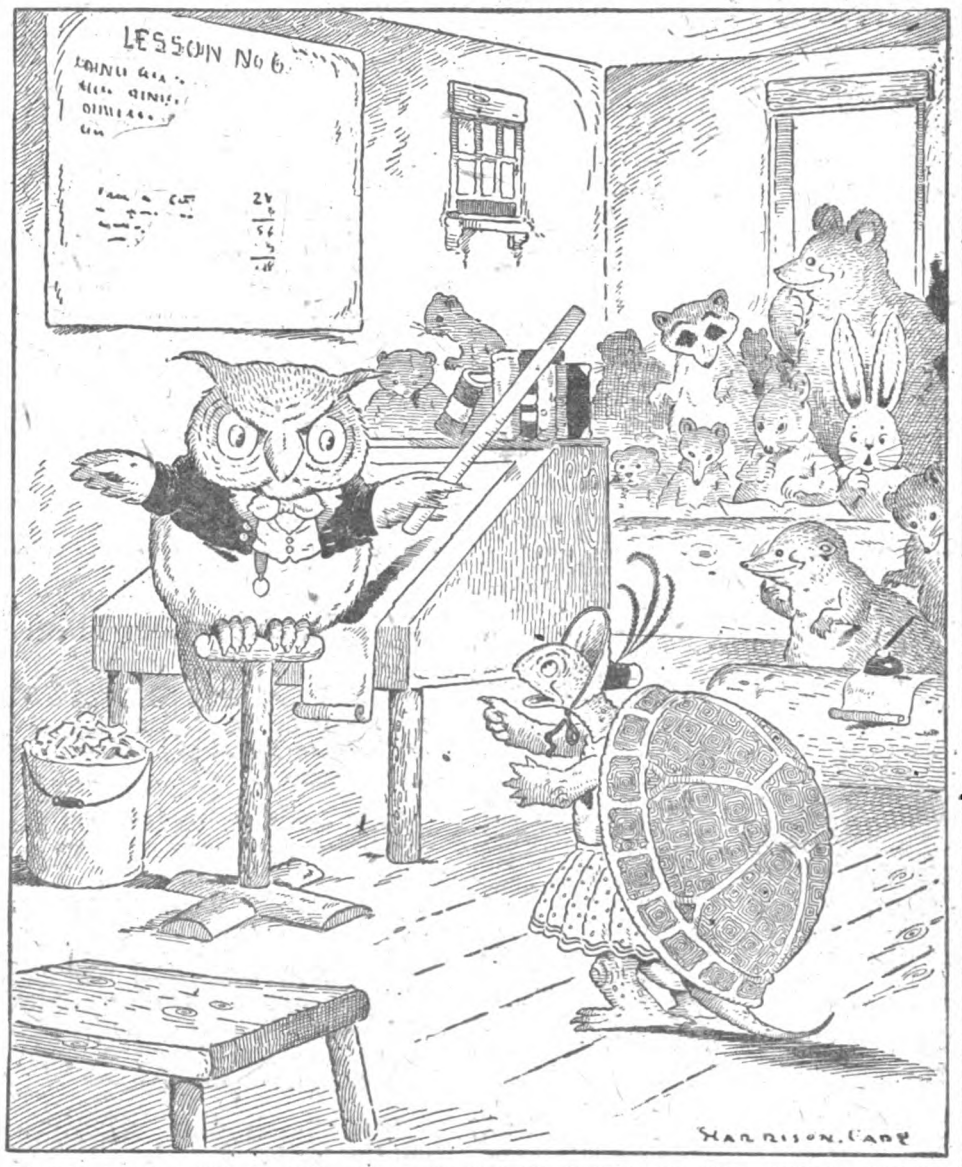
"I am always willing to arbitrate," said Wise Owl. "For the sake of peace, we will do as Cubby Bear says. Tillie Turtle may go back to her seat. Now, then, the Crow brought back in his beak a large green feather with a red tip, and laid it down at the feet of the little Indian.

"The child picked it up, looked at it closely, then looked at the Crow, and said something which, of course, the birds and animals could not understand. Then he laid it down again, looking at the Crow, who, understanding this better, took it in his beak, and flew a little way in the direction from which he had come.

"The child followed.

"The Crow went a little further, then waited for the little Indian.

"The two understood each other by this time, and went steadily on, while after them followed a crowd of animals and birds. So, in time, the little Indian was restored to his friends, but only the Crow went the whole distance with him. They had far to go, as the other Indians traveled some distance almost every day. The Crow had to leave the child sometimes to fly ahead and see if they were on the right track. The little Indian boy always trusted him to lead the way, and the two grew to be very good friends, so the Crow would let the child smooth his feathers.



"I will show you, by drawing a little map on the wall, the course they took."

Wise Owl looked for his maple-sugar chalk, but the eldest Little Badger had been quietly eating it, and was now wiping his lips with his little pocket-handkerchief.

"Please tell us another story!" said the pupils.

"Some other day," promised the teacher.

"Please let it be about another little Indian boy!" said Cubby Bear. "Oh, I wish one would come to our forest now. I would ask him to live at Mamma Bruin's house always, and be my little playmate!"

"IT WAS NOT A GREEN FEATHER THAT CROW BROUGHT BACK!" SHE CRIED SHRILLY, POINTING AT WISE OWL A SKINNY CLAW.

Three Wheel Chairs in November

531 Is COMFORT'S Total To Date

The three November wheel chairs go to Hazel Ione Cossel, 1428 East 22nd St., Des Moines, Iowa, 157; Mella Gunter, Elma, La., 95; Clyde Reason, R. R. 1 Mayflower, Ark., 90.

The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them.

Hazel Ione Cossel, age 12, has been a helpless cripple all her life due to paralysis caused by injuries at birth.

Nella Gunter, age 13, is unable to walk and cannot use her left hand. Her crippled condition was caused by an attack of fever which she suffered when two years old. She has been in this condition the past eleven years.

Clyde Reason, age 11, has been afflicted with a spinal trouble all his life. It has deprived him of the use of his legs.

WILLIE S. PRICE, ENJOYING HIS COMFORT WHEEL CHAIR.

These are three sad cases of child cripples who have never known the joys of normal childhood because they have never been able to walk. The COMFORT wheel chairs which you have helped to provide for them will be a source of pleasure to these little sufferers and help to their mothers in caring for them.

May the season inspire you to manifest the Christmas spirit by making an extra effort to boost the good work of COMFORT'S Wheel-Chair Club.

The picture of Willie S. Price enjoying his COMFORT wheel chair and his letter of thanks printed on this page will interest you.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

COMFORT the Means of Changing His Whole Life.

R. 1, Box 1, Crabtree, N. C.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

I am enclosing picture of myself enjoying my wheel chair which I obtained through your wonderful COMFORT magazine. I hope you will find room to reproduce it in COMFORT'S Wheel-Chair Department as I have made a host of dear friends through COMFORT and they have asked me to send you my picture for publication. COMFORT has been the means of changing my whole life, and has been of the greatest benefit to me spiritually and financially. I thank you and all the good friends who have helped me. You have my prayers and best wishes for continued success in your great work.

Your grateful friend, WILLIE S. PRICE.

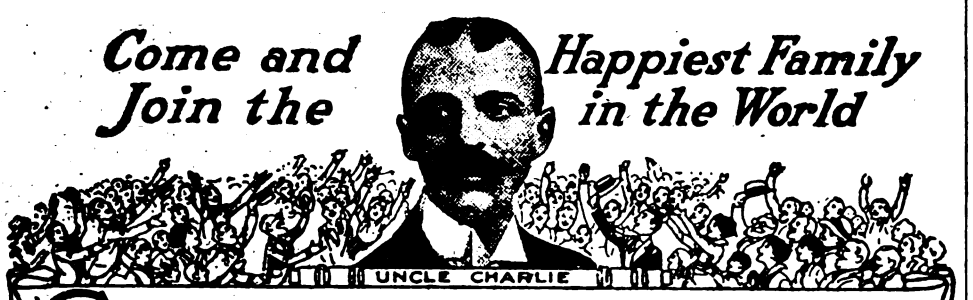
Crumbs of Comfort

The law of humanity is above the assertion of all human rights.



It often happens that those who are least known on earth are best known to God.

The strength of cheerfulness is wonderful and its endurance is past calculation.

How cunningly Nature hides every wrinkle of her antiquity under roses and morning dew.

To all men has been given the privilege of being happy if they but knew how to use the gifts at hand.

Of all earthly music, that which reaches the farthest into heaven is the beating of a loving heart.

LEAGUE RULES: To be a comfort to one's parents. To protect the weak and aged. To be kind to dumb animals. To love our country and protect its flag.

COMFORT for one year and admittance to the League of Cousins for only 55 cents. Join at once. Everybody welcome. ADDRESS all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. See instructions at the close of this Department.

HOP up onto my lap and let's have a chat and try to be cheerful even if our hearts are heavy, and mine was never heavier than now. I am so utterly disgusted with world conditions, that you will have to forgive me if I do not give you one of my old-time cheery Christmas talks. I knew when the war was over that a world that had been torn to pieces could not adjust itself in a few minutes, but I did hope that the lessons of that terrible conflict would be stamped deep on the heart of every human and make both men and women see a new light and inspire them in this period of reconstruction, to work with the same zeal that they displayed during the war. I did hope that out of all this bloodshed and sacrifice, which for a while thrust aside the mean and petty things of life and made people think in a big, broad human way, that we should evolve a Christian spirit that would reach out its loving arms to all the corners of the earth; evolve a national consciousness, which would make us all a little more tolerant, humane and Christlike than we ever had been before. But alas, for our fond dreams of a better and more unselfish world. Today we find, not regeneration but degeneration, not going upward and onward, but drifting backward and downward, not a desire to build, but a wild, willful determination to destroy. Not a spirit of fair play, of give and take, but a ferocious determination to defy the law, to demolish government and to grab everything, no matter to whom it belongs. We have discarded all the old ideas of honor, truth, justice and morality and are indulging in the morals of the jungle and the ethics of the cave man. Crime was never so open and rampant, vice never so bold and brazen. Directly we have a police strike and the hand of the law is lifted, thousands of hoodlums seem to spring out of the very earth and smash, ravage, pillage and destroy like the Vandals of old.

The war scarcely touched us, so there is no excuse for the lawlessness, ugliness, brutality, beastliness and Hunnishness that has seized upon large sections of our population. We must get behind the law and see that it metes out justice to the fiends who are disgracing us in the eyes of the world. The Huns and bums within have become more dangerous than the Huns without, and their lawless teeth should be pulled before it is too late. National unity, for which we were all striving, has become a farce. We do not vote as Americans for America. We vote in racial groups or sects and terrorize cringing politicians, until they give what is demanded, and the politician for his part, instead of defying lobbyists, figures out how many votes they will give him if he will promote the interests of their countries in Europe. So, while the world suffers and bleeds and civilization totters, politicians with their eyes on the 1920 election, grab each other by the throats and scramble for the votes of unassimilated foreigners, who defile our politics and plot to destroy our institutions. If we allow certain racial groups to dominate and terrorize us (and they are doing that very thing right now with an impudence and audacity that is appalling), certain of these groups will combine, and then the stronger group will give the weaker the laugh, dominate Congress, turn our government upside down and run the country to suit itself. There are political demagogues among us, who, by appealing to racial animosities and playing on the passions of various alien elements, who have not a spark of Americanism in their bodies, are trying to jockey themselves into the White House. These men have been pushing their fists in the faces of nearly every nation on earth, and if later on they are called on to make good their campaign promises, we shall be forced into another bloody conflict, and without a friend in the world, compelled to face a universe in arms. America needs friends, politicians care only for votes. A curb must be placed on these political kaisers. Then, too, we have strikes by the million, and these strikes simply force prices up by causing idleness and stopping production, which is the only thing that can bring down prices, for we cannot divide up things we have not got, and it is only by producing an abundance of food, clothes and human necessaries that prices can come down and we can have a normal, happy, satisfied world again. The sane and sensible labor leaders recognize this fact, but the Bolshevik, the demagogue and agitator, have thrust these men aside and are controlling the labor movement. They have done exactly what was done in Russia—fooled with their lying, insidious propaganda, the lowbrows and the boneheads (mostly alien who know nothing of this country, its history, its mighty contribution to world liberty and uplift) and filled their sluggish brains with anarchy and madness. Liberty is of God, license is of the devil, and it is license these men want. They are determined to take the power from constituted authority and rob, pillage and plunder at will. Meanwhile, as I write, Congress quibbles and snarls while Rome is burning. If this thing continues, we shall have to face the bitter truth that constitutional government of the people for the people by the people is an utter failure and only a Kaiser, or Czar, with sword and lash, can restore law and order and give decent people a chance to exist, if not to live, for the Bolsheviki will give us neither. Society advances only as we keep the baser elements in check.

If Congress is to fall on its knees, or tumble out of bed every time a foreigner with a vote casts his malign shadow across the halls of our legislatures, then this great country in which we took so much pride will indeed have become a foreign boarding house, Americans will disappear (they are fast going, anyway) and unabsorbed aliens will kick aside the corpse of Uncle Sam and fight to see who first can get into the White House bed. Some men love their work and rejoice in the doing of it, but the majority of people hate work and toil only because they have to. Their only god is pleasure, and their brains, if they ever had any, have slipped down into their bellies. Democracy, which is man's only salvation, is the rule of the people for the people by the people. Bolshevism, I. W. W.ism, left-wing socialism, mean rule of a class by a class for a class, and that class the lowest, most ignorant, degenerate and dangerous. Once make bellyism your god as these human cooties do and you are akin to the swine and the hogs that root and grunt in your backyards. Remember I know what I am talking about. I have been in the radical movement twenty-five years and have given my very life to it and know practically everyone connected with it, especially those who, like myself, have quit it in disgust. They, like myself, fought for the under dog, because they thought he was a good dog; they did not, however, realize that too many of the under dogs had hydrophobia, and were not seeking justice but merely waiting for a chance to spring on the upper dog and all other dogs not of their class and tear them to pieces. The rabid under dog wanted revenge and the earth as well. The only cure for democracy is more democracy, the only cure for revolutionary mad dog hydrophobia is machine guns. Remember, the men who fought and bled for liberty are not the ones who are trying to turn this country into a hell. Those men with a few exceptions came back better Americans than ever. It is the bellyists who are doing the grabbing, raising all the trouble. The gang who stayed behind and profiteered and grew fat, both laborer and capitalist, on the needs and woes of a war-torn world. Nearly everybody who could graft on Uncle Sam without being caught at the job, grabbed all he could and did as little as he could for it. It was a glorious occasion for all concerned to get their hands into the national grab bag, and by the time they got through there was nothing but the bag left. And now the fear of Prussianism is removed, they want the same war wages and the old spirit of grab continues. Old ideas and ideals that made us a real people are fast crumbling. It is wealth, values and commodities we want and not slips of dirty paper; for money is not wealth but merely a medium of exchange. We are suffering from over consumption and under production, thus entirely reversing the pre-war conditions. If people don't quit striking and start working, and if the fiendish, devilish Bolshevik agitators, who are inflaming the minds of the masses, are not hanged or deported, you will soon be running around with a pushcart full of money that will not buy you a loaf of bread. When money ceases to have any value as a purchasing power what good is it? The whole country has gone on a mad orgy of extravagance and spending, each bidding against the other for the few things we produce, and forcing prices to fantastic heights. Lengthen the working day for a year as the Germans have done and flood the market with goods and your dollar will be a dollar instead of thirty cents. Meanwhile, Liberty Bonds are being cashed, and a working girl we know (and there are thousands like her) spends fourteen dollars for a pair of paper pumps and six dollars for a pair of tin buckles to go with them and brags of her folly and has to get a "gentleman" friend to feed her the rest of the week. You can guess the rest and the wicked capitalist is blamed for it all. Few people can stand prosperity. Put a beggar on horseback and he will ride to the devil. Once we had one automobile to every eighteen people. Now if this block on which I live is any indication (and the people who live in it are just plain working folk), by the racket I hear at night there must be eighteen cars to nearly every family on the block. After a while the money will all be spent, and, demoralized by striking, loafing and spending (not for the necessaries of life but for its fripperies and follies), there will be a bloody upheaval. There is always trouble when the lunatic awakes. He will swear that the thrifty and decent people have robbed him and he will turn from spending to plunder, robbery and bloodshed, and all this madness is due to just plain swinish bellyism; placing the material things of life before the spiritual; worshiping Baal as the Israelites did of old and forgetting God. You will say I am a pessimist and an alarmist. I am neither. I do more reading and studying in a day than ten thousand average men do in a year and my telephone puts me in touch with all the worthwhile world. Though exhausted and suffering and racked with a thousand cares that war and labor conditions have brought on me, conditions that have made it almost an agonizing problem to live, I feel I should be false to you and the trust you place in me, did I not keep in touch with everything that is going on in this wild, crazy world of ours. I have the facts and I know the remedy. You have been bowing down to false gods; you have allowed your bellies to get the better of your brains; you have made your garage your church, and made day and night hideous with your shrieking flivvers and screaming Tin Lizzies. You have squandered your money foolishly instead of spending wisely. You have allowed the foreigner to rule your country and dominate your politics. You have permitted the weeds of alienism to choke the flower of Americanism. You have made the dove of peace more terrible than the hell hounds of war. Now this is the month in which we celebrate the birth of Christ, and it was the Christ who told you—you who are money mad—that it profited nothing if you gained the whole world and lost your own souls; and you are forcing our beloved America to lose its soul; you are forcing it to do the hog act and stew in the juice of isolation, while the rest of the world bleeds and suffers. Now brush the cobwebs from your Bibles, cut out the hoggishness, the selfishness and the greed and go to the manger of Bethlehem with contrite hearts and learn of Him who died that you might be humane, kind, lovable, charitable and Godlike. Both the Christ and your boys who are sleeping across the seas died for the same cause, even if in the heat of battle and the agony of death, those brave lads were incapable of realizing all their sacrifices meant. But the blood of those who saved our homes from destruction and the blood of Him who died for us on Calvary were both shed that all men might be holy and free. That blood was shed that men might grow in spirit, grace and righteousness. God pity us if by our greed, blindness, folly and stupidity we permit that sacrifice to be in vain.

Now I'll say good by for this year. I shall, if God spares me, at one o'clock, Christmas Day, drink your health in a glass of peptonized milk, which has been almost my sole diet since the strain of the war broke down what little health I had, two years ago. Let me, from the depths of a grateful heart, send a word of thanks and gratitude to the thousands of kind souls who have, by their words of sympathy and cheer, made it possible for me to continue my work. It is the love which you have lavished on me so abundantly that nerves me to fight your battles and my own, and without that love Uncle Charlie would pass into the silence and you would hear of him no more. So boost COMFORT all you can, for only through its columns can we spread our rays of light and hope on a dark, distracted world, and remember I carry you on my heart all the time. A peaceful Christmas and may God bless you all. P. S. A Christmas letter from you all will be most acceptable.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers, and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk covers, either one for a club of three subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best Christmas gifts in the world.

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the picture book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

ACKERMAN, R. R. 3, BOX 4, MISS.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am four feet three inches tall, thirteen years old and in the eighth grade. Have brown eyes and black hair. Have a father, mother, five brothers and four sisters. We live on a two-hundred acre farm in the country and I like country life fine. We have five cows and three horses. We have a real nice time in our country home especially on Sunday evening, when sister's beau comes. Well that's where I say to myself: "Here's where I have to stay at home while they go kodaking." I am going to get me a kodak, so I can go when my sister goes too. My sister Florence is attending the normal school in town. Uncle, I have your book of poems and think it is fine. Will some of the cousins please send me "When the Sun Goes Down in Dixie, and the Moon Begins to Rise"? I will return the favor the best I can.

Your niece, RUTH MCMULLIN.

Ruth, I am glad you live on a farm in the country instead of the city. These city farms seem to afford their owners lots of amusement, but they are a horrible nuisance to those who have to live next to them, around them or over them. The law allows a backyard city farmer to keep chickens, but the Board of Health does not permit the keeping of roosters. It is tough for a poor rooster to go through life a confirmed bachelor, deprived of the pleasure of associating with the opposite sex, and it is equally tough for a hen to have to die an old maid, without ever having had a chance to vamp a flirtatious rooster, or indulge in all the blissful emotions of love's young dream. Ah, me! It's a sad story, mates! The poultry enthusiast has a tough time trying to make a success of the game in one of these backyard farms, for though by breaking down a few walls and fences he may find room for a hen (that is, provided the hen has a fashionable toothpick, straight up and down silhouette shape), it is utterly impossible to find room for both the hen and the egg at the same time. Poultry fanciers and those with agricultural aspirations should shake the dust of the cities from their feet and go into the country where they can indulge to the fullest their desire to raise crops, chickens and chin whiskers. Ruth, it is very kind of you to stay home while sister and her beau go "kodaking," but what in thunder is kodaking? Can't they kodak in the parlor without going outdoors to do it? Kodaking, I suppose, is something more novel, exciting and interesting than old-fashioned love making or courting, though it always seemed to me that was a blissful experience that could not be improved on. Billy the Goat informs me, Ruth, that you mean that sister and her beau go for a walk and take the camera along and take snapshots of the scenery and of one another. Well, for my part, I don't think that is an improvement on the old-fashioned kodaking on the sofa, for in the good old-fashioned days the only scenery worth looking at when you were in love was your best girl's face, and you were so busy landing snapshots among the freckles or on her ruby lips that you did not notice that pa and ma and all the kids were standing in the doorway taking in the show. Ah, me! those were the good old days before the Kaiser had dynamited the universe; when the high cost of living and loving had not made existence intolerable; the good old days when the hired man was content with a hundred dollars a week instead of a thousand dollars a minute, and a girl was a girl instead of a paint and powder factory. Ah, me, give me the good old days. I'll take my love-making straight without any substitute, camouflage or adulteration of the kodaking variety. Ruth, try and improve your penmanship, you can do it if you wish. Leave kodaking and songs alone until you can write a legible hand.

BOGUECHITTO, R. R. 4, MISS.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

We live on a small farm, five miles from our post office. We raise corn, cotton, potatoes, sugar-cane, peanuts, fruit and vegetables. Uncle Charlie, our geography teaches us that the sun stands still and that the earth revolves around it, and the Bible says that God commanded the sun to stand still so Joshua could fight a battle. Our geography too, teaches that the earth is round, and the Bible tells of the four corners of the earth. I would very much like to know your ideas on these two subjects. I am a country girl fourteen years young, five feet five inches tall, light complexion, black hair and blue eyes. My brothers are calling me to go horseback riding, so I will have to go.

Your loving niece, CLARA MAY EDWARDS.

The books of the Old Testament were written by the poets, prophets and wise men of their time. These men were Orientals, and men of the Orient always clothe their thoughts in language that is poetic and flowery. The Orientals are fond of elaborate ceremonies, and they are full of sentiment and blessed with imaginations that transcend anything we Occidentals possess. It is a very ticklish matter to discuss a question of this kind, for if one does one always starts a hornets' nest buzzing about one's ears. In Old Testament days it was natural that men should think that the earth was the center of the universe and that the sun revolved around it. It is only in comparatively recent years that astronomers and scientists revealed to the wondering world those marvelous facts concerning our solar system of which the ancients knew practically nothing. If the earth were to suddenly stop we should all be shot into space. It was a long time before people could be convinced that the world was round instead of flat. It is poetic license, however, to refer to the four corners of the earth, even though it is round, and it would be quite possible with an omnipotent God to stop the earth from revolving without giving us a jolt, if He felt so disposed. When the pacifist wanted authority, or rather an excuse for allowing the Germans to walk all over him, he quoted such verses from the Bible

Dorothy's Christmas Soldier

by Joseph F. Novak

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

IT began the year the war ended and I have Dorothy, my little sister, to thank for it all.

I had acted as one of the bridesmaids to Adele Farnsworth and the newspapers published a picture of the bride and her attendant bridesmaids and spoke glowingly of our beauty. Dorothy saw the picture, gazed at it a long time, then voiced her soul's ambition in the plaint:

"Oh, I wish I could have my name and picture in the newspaper!"

Rather elated at the nice write-up (for you must admit that most of us like compliments), I answered consolingly:

"Your turn will come, Mousie, so don't be discouraged."

"I know," Dorothy repied, "but it's a long time to wait to grow up. I'm only seven, and I'd like to see at least my name printed right now."

"Well," I replied again, "I wonder if there isn't someway of accomplishing that?" And with the words, I picked up the news-sheet, and glanced through it.

Suddenly my attention was attracted by an article and I passed it over to my little sister. "Read that, Dorothy, and your problem is solved."

Dorothy is able to read very well, and the article in question being written in simple, direct English, the child sensed it at once.

It concerned the project of sending Christmas boxes to the boys at the front, for though the armistice was signed and the war practically over, still many thousands of boys would be obliged to spend the coming Christmas in foreign lands. And all it required to make one of these lonely boys happy was two dollars to purchase a Christmas box for him, and whoever sent in a two-dollar bill would have his name printed in the paper, which would thus acknowledge the contributions as they came in.

Here was Dorothy's chance!

"It must be dreadful for the soldiers to be away from home at Christmas time and not receive anything from Santa Claus," the child observed. "Oh, Marian, would they print my name in the paper if I sent two dollars and would some lonely soldier boy get a package with my name upon it?"

"Undoubtedly, Mousie," I answered.

"Then I'm going to do it," Dorothy decided. "I'll make papa give me two dollars for some of my thrift stamps and when I save another two dollars I'll buy them back."

I couldn't help snatching the dear to my heart.

"Why, you little chick, I'll give you the money."

But Dorothy would not accept it. If she were to send the two dollars in her name, she must make the sacrifice, and as I believe in encouraging character-building virtues, I said:

"Very well, Mousie. I'll take the thrift stamps and you may redeem them at any time," and getting my purse, I got out a two-dollar bill while Dorothy pranced away to get her thrift stamps. The exchange was presently made and Dorothy sat down and wrote her letter to the great newspaper.

The next morning, to her unspeakable delight, the name "DOROTHY LOUISE CHARLTON" was listed among the names published of those who had donated two dollars for a Christmas box for a soldier boy.

Dorothy treasured the newspaper, showing it proudly to her friends, and then when Christmas rolled around, she placed it with her profusion of gifts, the choicest present of all.

The bright holiday season passed, and after a bit, Dorothy began to speak less of her Christmas soldier, as she had termed the lad who would receive her contribution. But she did not forget him, for she mentioned him from time to time. And then, a month or so after Christmas, all her interest in him was reawakened, when, one morning, as the postman came around, he left a letter addressed to "Miss Dorothy Louise Charlton" which bore the imprint of soldier's mail.

In great joy she opened it.

"Marian, dear," she said to me, "listen. Isn't it a lovely letter?" And then she read aloud the following:

"My dear Miss Charlton:

"I beg to thank you kindly for the beautiful Christmas package which came to me bearing your name. Had it not come, I should have been without a Christmas present on the most wonderful Day of Days.

"Accept my kindest thanks and my sincere hope that I may some day reciprocate.

"Very gratefully yours,

"MANSON F. KING."

The letter aroused all Dorothy's interest in her soldier and she now discussed him anew with me on all occasions. Did I suppose he was tall? And did I think he looked as lovely as the soldiers she had seen in the parades of home-coming soldiers?

"Dear me, Mousie," I teased, for her constant queries were beginning to make me think about the unknown soldier, "how should I know? Perhaps he's an ugly, bearish fellow with dirty hands and maybe he chews tobacco and swears!"

Dorothy became very indignant. "I don't think any of our soldier boys are ugly, Marian. They all look nice and none of them have dirty hands and I'm sure my Christmas soldier has not because he wrote such a pretty letter."

"You precocious mouse!" I exclaimed in admiration of the child's astuteness, "I never thought of that. Your soldier does write a 'pretty' letter. Too bad he didn't give you an address; you might then have written to him and asked for his picture and questioned him all about himself. But, little chick, you're taking such an interest in your soldier that I'm getting interested myself. I wonder what he does look like?" and now it occurred to me that I was speculating quite a bit about him.

The year passed and Christmas again approached. And one winter night, a ring came at the doorbell and Nanette announced a caller to see "Miss Dorothy Louise Charlton."

Dorothy jumped up and clapped her hands.

"To see me?"

"What name, Nanette?" I asked.

"Manson F. King," Nanette replied.

"Manson——" I began, but Dorothy with a shriek of delight, cried out:

"Oh, it's my Christmas soldier! Oh, Marian, may I have him sent in?"

"Show him in, Nanette," I said in answer, and the girl did.

Mr. Manson King bowed courteously, and looking at me with—will you pardon my conceit?—an undisguised gaze of polite admiration, said:

"You are Miss Dorothy Charlton?"

"I am her sister," I replied. "This is the person whom you came to see," and I gave Dorothy a little shove forward.

"Oh!"

I thought there was the faintest shade of disappointment in his voice, but it disappeared and the sunniest, most winning smile came to his eyes as Dorothy slipped her hands into his and said corially:

"Are you really my Christmas soldier?" I thought about you so much and if you had given me your address, I would have sent you a Christmas box on your birthday!"

Mr. King threw up his head and laughed a merry gale.

"I'm such a wretched correspondent," he apologized, "that I seldom think to attach my address to my letters. I hope you will forgive me. I'm glad you received my letter but I felt I really ought to thank you in person for that lovely Christmas box."

All this while he had been standing. Dorothy now noted it and said:

"Oh, you must sit down," for she evidently wished to make the most of her opportunity.

"Thank you," and Mr. King seated himself. I was struck with the unconscious, yet exquisite grace of his movements. "What military training does," I mused.

Dorothy now began to question her caller.

"So you liked my present?" she began.

"Indeed, yes! And as it was such a surprise, it was therefore doubly enjoyable, my dear," he responded.

"And wouldn't you have had a present on Christmas morning if it hadn't been for what I sent?" Dorothy rattled on sympathetically.

"Absolutely not one thing," Mr. King replied.

And then he continued to answer the questions with which Dorothy, with childish candor, plied him. He was a very merry-hearted chap, apparently, and he smiled most of the time in a way that showed off his white teeth.

But though he gave his attention to Dorothy apparently, every now and then I felt his eyes upon me, and on my side Dorothy's engaging his attention gave me an opportunity of observing him closely. His hair was black and trimmed to a nicety. And how splendidly he was set up, his limbs, shoulders and chest seemed moulded to a perfect physical standard. And what a splendid face he had, how well he used his voice and how choice he was of his language. Every detail of his uniform, too, was au fait, and he seemed unusually well tailored for a private. But that was all he was, for so his insignia indicated.

Gradually I was drawn into the conversation, and then Mr. King spoke of his experiences at the front, but always from a general standpoint. He did not preen himself upon any personal achievements. And he always tried to keep the amusing and interesting side of the war foremost.

Dorothy was perfectly intoxicated with her soldier, and when he, after a stay which propriety would sanction, rose to take his leave, she was almost inconsolable.

"Couldn't you stay a little longer, Private King?" she queried.

"For a first call, my dear, I'm afraid I've overstayed my time."

"Well, then, won't you call again and stay longer? And then, perhaps, Marian would order a nice little lunch for us all."

"With such an alluring prospect, I don't see how I can refuse provided Miss Marian does not object," Mr. King returned. "And may I not bring you something nice in return for that beautiful Christmas box?"

"But aren't you a poor soldier, Mr. King?" Dorothy asked gravely.

His ruddy cheeks flushed, and for the first time he looked confused. I pitied him from the bottom of my heart. I saw how the child's innocent remark had hurt him. Dorothy had intended to be kind, but it wounded him to be thus reminded of his poverty and friendlessness, a poverty and friendlessness so great that he must needs apply to a charitable organization to get a bit of Christmas cheer. And to be reminded of his poverty at this particular moment, he, who seemed so refined, so polished——

I came to the rescue.

"We shall be very pleased to have you call again and often, Mr. King," I said, as cordially as I could. But I thought I saw that the wound still hurt and I couldn't help it when I exclaimed compassionately: "Oh, I'm so sorry!"

"You need not make an apology, Miss Charlton," he replied, and a soft light came into his eyes, that made me feel I was standing in the presence of a great and beautiful character. "I understand, and I think it was sweet thoughtfulness on the part of the child, though a little embarrassing, I admit. You will be pleased to have me call again? For I would not want to intrude?"

"It will be no intrusion, really," I replied.

"Thank you. Then I shall come."

And he did call a few nights after, bringing a small souvenir from the battlefield for Dorothy. This evening papa and mamma were in and met him. They were charmed with him for he had a regard, an old-fashioned courtesy, for the old people that quite won them. And in speaking of his experiences, he referred to his collection of souvenirs so that papa asked him to call again and bring some of them along.

This he did and the visit ended with an invitation for another. And another. And another——

But I was beginning to be troubled. Though perfectly courteous at all times, there was in his manner that which told me he was losing his heart to me, or at least I, who had already had several offers, thought he displayed the usual signs. (You will forgive this? I know it sounds so brazenly conceited.)

And I? I could not gainsay that the man appealed to me. But was I losing my heart to a uniform? I tried to imagine him in civilian clothing. And thus mentally making him a plain citizen, where place him in the social scale? He had not said a word about his family or how he had been employed before the war except once or twice when a stray slip gave me the impression that he had been doing manual work. He was so big of body and possessed of wonderful strength—suppose he were a factory hand of some sort? But a factory hand with such grace, such evident refinement! But, ah, did only the rich have refinement? No! and too many, unfortunately, lack it.

Mr. King never said anything of his plans. I knew, however, that he had been mustered out. Was a grim factory awaiting him, beckoning him to a place at a flaring furnace? Did some such mundane existence await him and was he banking on his uniform to admit him to the precincts of my father's luxurious home?

Yet, who had won the war? Wasn't it these "buck privates," these trench diggers, these motor truck drivers who had done the heavy work, the dirty work, who had lived in the trenches, who had plashed through the slime and filth and mud? Yes, and, ah, weren't they the heroes?

As I thought of all this, I thrilled. What could be more splendid than to have a husband who had done that? A commissioned officer might have been more romantic, perhaps, but Mr. King had done his humble bit and for this I honored him, for this I respected him, for this, aye, I loved him!

The week before Christmas came. And then two nights before Christmas Eve he called and proposed and I—I—I hesitated.

"I shall call again on Christmas Eve, Marian," Manson whispered in my ear as he leaned close to me. "I'll give you until then to think it over. If you decide you cannot marry me, draw down the shade of the living-room and I'll know that is a signal for me not to come again. But if my answer is 'yes,' leave it up and place a bowl of holly in the light of the window."

"You are romantic," I smiled.

What should my decision be? I loved him, I knew that. It was not the uniform and I knew his glory and attraction would not fall away once the uniform was laid aside, for through it all, I saw Manson King, the man.

Christmas Eve came. And when it came time for the shades to be drawn, one was left up and on the window-ledge I placed a bowl of holly.

It was not long after when I thought I heard the front door open. But I paid no attention to the matter, until suddenly I saw in the doorway a tall figure. Manson! I——well, I simply ran to him, and when I felt the dear feel of his strong arms about me, I felt I never wanted to leave them, but rested, satisfied, against his bosom.

When I did look up, however, I saw behind my soldier a big basket of American beauties towering toward the chandelier. During those heavenly moments I felt Mason slipping a ring on my finger, but now for the first time I noted the size and the brilliancy of the diamond. But most wonderful of all was the insignia on his shoulder.

"Manson!" I exclaimed, my hand upon it.

"Private King won your heart; can Captain King hold it?" he queried tenderly.

"You—a captain?" I gasped.

"Yes."

"But——"

"Explanations?" Manson laughed. "Easy. Well, I received my commission some time before we got into the war."

"But why did you visit us in the capacity of a private, and why your confusion when Dorothy asked you if you were not a poor soldier?"

"The boys, for a joke, slipped my name on the list of boys who hadn't any friends to remember them at Christmas time. Of course, I knew nothing of the matter, yet coincidentally enough, none of the packages sent me from my friends reached me at Christmas so that I would have been apparently as neglected as the most forlorn little doughboy in the outfit if Dorothy's package hadn't come to me. So since I was a poor lad, I decided to see who the person was who sent me the box, thinking perhaps it might be some impressionable elderly lady or giddy young girl. And so I called in the capacity of a private and when Dorothy made the reference she did I was suddenly recalled to the role I was playing. And of course, when I saw the donor's delightful sister, it was all off." And Manson caught me up.

"Why did you want me to leave the shade up?" I asked.

"I wanted to burst in upon you in all my glory and these," he responded, touching the stately beauties whose fragrance filled the room.

And then Manson told me his family history which I need not take up your time to read, except to say that he was a junior partner in a firm established by his paternal grandfather which as he teasingly said: "brings me enough income to afford a box at the opera every season."

Dorothy, in the meantime, had been getting ready for the evening celebration. Now she came downstairs in the glory of her new gown.

"Oh, how lovely you look, Mr. King!" she exclaimed, impressed at once with the difference which his cap (which I made him put on for my admiration) made.

"Yes," said Manson gravely. "I was made a captain and am no longer poor, so that I want you to accept some presents which I brought for you. Have Nanette bring them in."

Nanette did so and Dorothy yelled with delight.

"Oh, I just love you, Captain King, I just love you," she shrieked.

"Well, then, such being the case, I don't suppose you'll object to my becoming your big brother?"

"My big brother?" Dorothy was a bit puzzled.

"Yes, I'm going to marry Marian and that will make me your brother. Shall you like that?"

But to show that she would, Dorothy took the easiest way. She exercised her sisterly prerogative and kissed him.

teaspoon of soda and one teaspoon of cream of tartar and sift again. Measure one cup of milk and add alternately with the flour to the egg mixture. When done, the cake should be about two inches thick. The following day, cut cake into three-inch squares, scoop out the centers and round the sides. Hold each piece on a wire and dip into boiled frosting, sprinkle with a little cocoanut and set to dry. As the frosting must be very soft when the dipping is done, it may be necessary to dip the second time. Just before serving, put into the center of the under half a few small candies or a few cubes of jelly. Serve on individual plates garnished with a spray of evergreen.

FRIED APPLES.—Wipe, core and slice, without paring, into eighths, and fry in salt pork until browned. Sprinkle with brown sugar and a dash of cinnamon. Add a little hot water, cover and steam a few minutes.

The Pretty Girls' Club

Conducted by Katherine Booth

To Part or Not to Part

OUR grandmothers prized their hair above every other beauty attribute—they brushed it one hundred strokes at night, they did it up in nightcaps, and protected it from every profaning touch. It was silken and smooth and it lay in beautiful loops about their ears, one straight part dividing it just above the brow.

We suffered a reaction from grandmother's primness, and rushed to the extreme of pompadours which stood terrifyingly high, to "ratted" hair, and to a conspicuous neglect of the mollifying effect of a hairbrush. Where grandmother abjured curling irons as destroyers of her precious locks, we burned our hair without compunction in the daily effort to produce lovely curling tresses. Now, we who like to look as pretty as we can, have struck a happy medium. No longer is the towering pompadour in good taste, no longer are frizzed locks permissible, yet we do not plaster our hair down as meekly as did grandmother.

I had a letter the other day from one of my girls who said, in speaking of her hair, that she wore it in a pompadour. So, said I to myself, said I, perhaps I would better just say a word to the rest of my girls about pompadours and parts. And here I am saying it. Pompadours are not in fashion any longer, girls, and it is well, for brushing the hair straight back from the forehead wears away the hair line and is apt in time to heighten the forehead unduly. A part is quite the mode at present, and a good rest for that forehead line. Not a part like grandmother's, primly in the center of the forehead, but a part a little to one side of the middle of the forehead—usually to the left, with the hair on the left side brushed straight down and puffed a little over the ear, while the hair on the right side is brought down over the forehead a little and adjusted to suit the needs of that particular face. Look at the pictures I give you this month and you will see three different ways of utilizing this part. In one the hair is waved quite a good deal before covering the ear; in one it is merely undulating while the hair to the right of the part is rather plain, and in the third there is still more of a wave. All three, however, follow the mode of the left-hand part. It is permissible to transfer the part to the right side of the head—indeed, a very good plan is to wear a left-hand part for a few months, then a right-hand part, to rest the hair and prevent the part from widening.

Don't brush your hair too much away from your forehead—very few faces stand well so much disclosing. Study your face and adjust the hair to lie softly on your forehead where it is the most becoming to you. If you have very heavy dark hair and black eyebrows, you cannot wear the hair as low on the forehead as if you had blonde hair and light eyebrows. To be beautiful, one must use common sense and realize that each of us is a separate problem which cannot be solved in exactly the same way as any other problem on earth. So find out your good points and weak points and govern yourself accordingly. But in any case I am safe in saying that a pompadour is a very trying way of wearing the hair, and at present quite out of style. Stick to parts!

Answers to Questions

ANGIE.—If you are only four feet eleven inches tall, you do not need to weigh as much as those who have an extra foot to support. But you are under weight, just the same, and the fact that your hair is falling out, and your bust growing flabby, shows that you need building up. What you need to do is be careful in selecting your food, in chewing it until it is liquid before swallowing, in drinking plenty of water and getting plenty of sleep with lots of fresh air in the room. Eat only at meals; drink between meals. Potatoes, boiled until dry and mealy, or baked; rice; cereals with cream and sugar; bread and butter; milk will all help you to gain flesh. Do not eat fried foods, nor too many sweets. About the gooseflesh on arms and legs, be sure to take a complete body bath daily, and immediately afterward rub the skin of the body briskly with a Turkish bath towel. If you have no bathtub, you can take a bath very nicely with nothing but a bowl of hot soapy water, another of clear warm water, and a folded bath towel on which to stand. In cold weather, slip on a bathrobe, then uncover just one arm and bathe that thoroughly, and rub dry. Cover that up, and bathe the other arm; then the chest, the abdomen, one leg at a time, and finally, last of all, very quickly and briskly the back. In this way, the body will not be exposed, and you will not become chilled. Your gooseflesh will soon disappear, and as you add flesh your skin will fill out and become firm and smooth. Try eating a big bowl of cereal and cream or milk for breakfast with plenty of hot toast (no hot biscuit, at any time, please, for I do not think you digest them), a soft-boiled egg, and a dish of stewed prunes, a baked apple, some grapefruit or an orange. Prunes should be washed thoroughly, then soaked over night in plenty of water and cooked slowly for about two hours in the water in which they have soaked. Many prunes need no sugar at all. Your hair is troubling you because of your general health. You must build yourself up as if it were your one job in life, and soon the other difficulties will disappear. Eat an apple before going to bed, and get a certain amount of outdoor exercise every day. You say you are roundshouldered. You must get over that, for you are not giving your lungs room enough to function in, and they must have this room if your blood is to be healthy and your general health improved. Practice shoulder and arm exercises two or three times a day, and make yourself stand erect. When you sit down, do not slump in your chair, but sit way back until the bottom of your spine touches the back of the chair, then hold the rest of the spine straight without touching the back of the chair. Here are some exercises. By the way, they will help to develop your bust, as well!

To Straighten the Shoulders

Stand erect, heels together, toes out, chin up, chest well forward, shoulders dropped. Now stretch the arms out in front of you on a level with the shoulders, palm touching palm, elbows rigid. Breathe in slowly while you count eight, at the same time throwing the arms back as if you were trying to make them meet, being careful always to keep them on the level of your shoulders. Of course you cannot make them meet, but keep on trying. Still keeping them on a level with the shoulders, bring them forward again, letting out your breath as you do so. Repeat ten or twelve times. Deep breathing will help to develop your chest and straighten your shoulders, so practice breathing in slowly and holding the breath for a few seconds, then letting it out as slowly. This expands the cells of the lungs, which you are now probably not using because you are crowding your lungs through letting your shoulders round. The amount of air you take into your lungs determines how pure your blood shall be, and that in turn regulates your health, the beauty of your complexion, the beauty of your figure. Isn't it worth while to give the lungs a chance to do their work? Get after those shoulders—they are responsible for most of your troubles.

BERTHA.—The first thing to do is to give your scalp and those of the children a thorough shampoo, following which you must thoroughly wash all brushes and combs. I judge from what you say of your hair that you have a condition that could easily be transmitted to the children, so be careful that you do not use your brush for the children. As a matter of fact, each person should have her own brush, for dandruff and other troubles of the scalp are transmitted by a common brush. In your case, you must be sure that nobody else uses your brush and comb, and you yourself should wash the brush daily. A physician recommends adding one tablespoonful of oil of ergot to four tablespoonfuls of olive oil, and annointing the scalp the night before a shampoo. You could use a medicine dropper which you can buy for ten cents at your druggist's. Part the hair, then run the dropper along the part. Part again about an inch away, from the forehead to nape of neck, and use dropper again. Continue until you have gone over the entire scalp in this way—the scalp, remember, not the hair. Of course, some of the oil will get on the hair, but the place you want to apply it is the scalp. Pin your head up in a towel, so that you will not soil your pillows, and go to bed. In the morning, give your hair and scalp a thorough shampoo, using a shampoo liquid made by shaving half a bar of white household soap into a quart of boiling water, and letting it stand over a gentle flame until it is thoroughly dissolved. Dampen the whole head with warm water, then pour a little of the liquid on the parted hair, so that it reaches the scalp, part in another place and do the same, then rub vigorously, massaging the scalp with the fingers and giving it a thorough shampoo. Rinse thoroughly, then use more of the shampoo liquid, rub and massage, and rinse again. Use a last amount of the liquid, and finally rinse many, many times until you are sure there is no soap left in the hair. For your children, use just plain olive oil on the scalp the night before a shampoo, to loosen the dandruff; otherwise shampoo as I have directed you for yourself. Be very careful about rinsing. Do not comb a child's hair vigorously, or brush it hard. A comb is just to untangle hair, not to touch the scalp; a brush is to gently spread the natural oil of the scalp over the entire length of the hair, but both brush and comb should be used very gently, else the skin of the scalp is irritated and broken, producing dandruff. The children's hair should be shampooed once in two weeks, regularly, unless any one of them has very dry hair. Gentle brushing daily will probably do away with any dryness, but if it does not, then shampoo that child's hair only once in three weeks. Your hair needs a shampoo once in two weeks, I should say, with the oil used the night previous. Anything which improves your general health will help your hair as well, so take as good care of yourself as you can.

TWO PARTED COIFFURES BUT ONE QUITE SEVERE AND THE OTHER MUCH WAVED.

CORA.—Yes, your letter was too late for an issue of COMFORT earlier than this one. Here is the way to take the milk diet—I am glad you are going to try it. For the first week, you may have one meal a day, at night, about six or six-thirty. Otherwise, you must let all food alone. At night put to soak half-a-dozen prunes in a tumbler of warm water (after thoroughly washing them, of course), and in the morning on rising first drink two glasses of warm water slowly; then fifteen minutes later, eat the prunes, masticating them thoroughly, and drink the prune juice. Fifteen minutes later, drink a glass and a half of milk, "chewing" each mouthful, so that it is thoroughly mixed with the saliva before swallowing. You see, milk is almost entirely digested in the mouth, and if you gulp it down it is only partly digested. An hour later, take another glass and a half, and so continue taking milk every hour until three-thirty—assuming that you took your first at 7.30. About six-thirty or six, take your dinner—a very simple one, and between that hour and going to bed drink two glasses of water. Keep this up for a week. The second week, drop all solid food, and take just milk—two glasses an hour beginning at 7.30 and continuing to and including 6.30. Remember to sip and "chew" the milk. Keep up the prunes in the morning and the water night and morning. You should gain from one to three or four pounds a week on this diet. Weigh the afternoon of the day you begin the treatment, and then the afternoon of each Saturday thereafter.

HAMPTON.—The high chest and beautiful throat are the result, in most cases, of proper breathing, proper eating, and proper postures of the body. If your chest is flat, you can remedy it. You need breathing exercises, shoulder and arm exercises. See answer to "Angie." Practice these exercises and the deep breathing with perseverance. They will develop your chest and fill out the hollows in your neck. In the meantime, you must also look after your diet and all bodily functions. The bowels should move regularly and naturally once a day. Drinking plenty of water, eating fruit and vegetables will help this. Prunes well cooked, and thoroughly chewed, are excellent to help elimination. Don't blame "Nature" for the flat chest—because it lies quite in your power to correct the condition; in fact, it exists only because you have had faulty habits of breathing, sitting and standing. I know you will go to work to correct all these, and therefore I can assure you that it will not be long until your chest fills out. Don't expect it to happen in a week, however, and remember your exercises and breathing must be kept up. It will do no good to exercise for two days, then skip a day, then exercise once the next day, and forget all about it the following day. Plan out your exercises and practice them regularly, never less than twice a day, while your deep breathing you can practice many times a day, as you have a moment, or as you go marketing or to church or any other place which gives you a few minutes' walk.

OLIVE.—Depilatories cannot remove hair permanently; they only take off the hair at the skin and soon it returns, as you have found. Electrolysis will remove hair safely, but it is expensive and requires an experienced operator, so that except in the large cities it is difficult to use this method. It costs five dollars an hour, but quite a number of hairs can be removed in even fifteen minutes. The next best thing is the French treatment, which consists of moistening the hairy spot with ammonia and letting it dry; then the next day moistening it with peroxide, and continuing the treatment daily. The ammonia dries the hair and in time kills the root; the peroxide bleaches it while the killing process is going on. It is a long, slow process and requires a lot of patience. Some people require a great deal of time to produce any results, but it is the best thing you can do. I would let the down on my face alone and only treat the upper lip.

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Full directions for making and use come in each box of Barbo Compound. It will gradually darken streaked, faded gray hair, and make it soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy, and does not rub off.—Advt.

Your Hair Needs Danderine

Save your hair and double its beauty. You can have lots of long, thick, strong, lustrous hair. Don't let it stay lifeless, thin, scraggly or fading. Bring back its color, vigor and vitality. Get a 35-cent bottle of delightful "Danderine" at any drug or toilet counter to freshen your scalp; check dandruff and falling hair. Your hair needs stimulating, beautifying "Danderine" to restore its life, color, brightness, abundance. Hurry, Girls!

Hair Often Ruined By Careless Washing

Soap should be used very carefully, if you want to keep your hair looking its best. Most soaps and prepared shampoos contain too much alkali. This dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle, and ruins it.

The best thing for steady use is Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo (which is pure and greaseless), and is better than anything else you can use.

One or two teaspoonfuls will cleanse the hair and scalp thoroughly. Simply moisten the hair with water and rub it in. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, which rinses out easily, removing every particle of dust, dirt, dandruff and excessive oil. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and it leaves the scalp soft, and the hair fine and silky, bright, lustrous, fluffy and easy to manage.

You can get Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo at any drug store, it's very cheap, and a few ounces will supply every member of the familly for months.

The Talcott Treasure

By Anne McQueen

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Colonel Talcott, before the beginning of the Civil War, converts his securities into eagles and double eagles. Trusting his overseer, who is also a soldier, and confiding the secret to his wife, the men leave the town for the plantation, where he intends to secrete the treasure. Both men are killed in a skirmish and no trace of the money is discovered. Fifty years later, Eleanor Talcott and Nancy Dare, working in New York for the same firm and discussing the possibilities of the future and longing for a home, are surprised by Eleanor receiving a letter. Her father's great Aunt Talcott, whom she has never seen, leaves a plantation to her great nephew or his heirs and assigns. Nancy, who is practical and engaged to John Carr, realizes the expense of keeping the plantation up. Eleanor, with memories of sunshine, flowers and mocking birds, is anxious to go, provided Nancy will make it her home. Both girls go to Georgia, where they are driven from the station to the plantation ten miles distant, by an antebellum negro, who announces their arrival to the old negro servants, Brer Silas, Daphne, and Bahama, her husband. Going into the old house, whose doors swing on rusty hinges, Nancy wonders if Eleanor will live in this forsaken place. Daphne takes them to a chamber, from whose walls the paper hangs and the ceiling showing bare laths, then hurries to prepare supper. The next morning Bahama shows the girls the premises, which are sadly neglected, and repeats the desire of the half strainers, who own a beautiful plantation adjoining, to buy old Miss' land. Eleanor realizes the need of general repairs but cannot consent to part with the Talcott heirlooms. Writing to Mr. Warner, her lawyer, and father's old-time friend, Eleanor goes down the road to mail the letter and, pausing beside a wire fence, attempts to pull down a branch twined with a vine, upon which grow luscious grapes. She is surprised by a friendly voice and the offer to reach the grapes for her. Retaining a picture of the stranger, she queries whom he can be. Eleanor finally decides upon repairing the roof where it is absolutely necessary, buying an incubator and a mule. After going all over the house and seeing the rare old china and silver and wondering will she ever use them, she packs them carefully away, seeing only the face of the young man who gives the grapes. Mr. Warner, Eleanor's attorney, calls and wants to know what they intend to do. He gives his advice freely—better think twice and go back North. From the incubator set with two hundred eggs, fifty chicks come forth and with the New Year a norther which freezes them. While Eleanor and Bahama strew leaves over their bodies, a man in livery and on horseback appears with a bag filled with quail and mallards from the lake, presenting them with Mr. Muir's compliments. Eleanor refuses the gift—not knowing Mr. Muir, and later she sees through a tangled hedge a man pass on horseback. It is Mr. Muir, whose picture is printed on her heart, and he, realizing her stubborn pride, determines to break the barrier by calling with his mother, when Eleanor, with the air of a princess, assisted by Nancy, entertains them in the only room, their bedroom, where there is a fire. Mrs. Muir, glad to have young neighbors, invites them to visit at any time. Eleanor, with simple dignity, thanks her, believing self-respect prevents accepting courtesies and returning visits and again she refuses their offerings of fruits and flowers. David Muir enlists Nancy, whose friendship he would like, though Miss Talcott ignores him. He goes back to his home in the North. In the meanwhile, Neddy, the mule, leaps over the fence and devours vegetables growing on the Muir estate, the manager placing the damages at one hundred dollars, which Eleanor pays, knowing the small balance to be left when the check is cashed and she must tell Nancy to go to her John. Mrs. Warner, laden with good things to eat, goes to the plantation and meeting both girls, recognizes Eleanor by the Talcott favor. After a bountiful dinner she queries if they have hunted for the bags of gold Eleanor's great-great Uncle Talcott hid from the Yankees. She believes they will find it and the girls begin the search for the Talcott treasure.

CHAPTER V.

A DARK young man, of medium height and somewhat inclined, his enemies might say, to chubbiness; with a good-looking face that fairly radiated good nature, and dark, bright eyes that always twinkled humorously upon the world in general, jumped out of an automobile at the big-gates of the Talcott place; seized a biggish, confectionery-appearing package, and, tossing the required coins to the chauffeur, bade him return for him in the evening—and not come before nine o'clock.

As the auto departed on its way back to the town from whence it had brought him, the young man—who was none other than John Carr, on a surprise visit to Nancy, paused and surveyed the scene before him with a low, long whistle of surprise.

The weeds were cut in the avenue, but they still flourished greenly in the grove—Eleanor had found them too much for her feeble strength to cope with. Being summer, the vines that bowered the moldy walls of the old mansion were gay with flowers, and the yard was overrun with blossoming beds. Eleanor, though a decided failure in the truck-growing business, seemed to charm flowers into growing for her; the old, half-dead bushes and shrubs and vines had been coaxed into new life and vigor by her tender hands, so that they did their best to hide the decay of her abode with their bright bravery of color, and their luxuriant greenery of foliage.

"Marianna of the moated grange, for a fact!" commented John Carr, surveying the house through the overlacing arms of the old trees, which tried to hide it from the plebian gaze of wayfarers by their shrouds of funereal moss.

"My poor little Nancy, sun-loving, sight-loving, folks-loving little girl that she is, shut up in these moldy old walls, shrouded by curtains of Spanish moss, away from the city lights, and warmth and sounds—wonder she's living to tell the tale! Well, it just shows what love can do—her love for Eleanor kept her here, and now, by jinks, her love for me'll take her away!"

And, with a very determined tread, and a look of warfare in his eyes, John marched up the avenue to storm the moated grange and bear away his lady in triumph—if she consented to go!

The doors stood wide open, to let the summer winds wander at will through the wide old hall, which was quite empty. Standing on the threshold, John Carr rapped discreetly, but no one came to the door, though, afar off, he could hear a voice that thrilled him tenderly—the voice of Nancy, strangely muffled, and with a note of distress in it that sent John Carr scurrying away in search of his sweetheart.

He found her wedged in tightly behind a ponderous press in one of the big chambers; cobwebby, and with a smudge on her cheek, Nancy gave one glad cry when she beheld her lover and ecstatically sobbed upon his breast, while he kissed the smudge—which was uppermost, with loving loyalty.

"Nancy-girl, Nancy-love," he whispered, "I'm so glad to find you alive, honey! And I've come to take you away."

"No, you haven't, either," sobbed Nancy, rubbing her teary eyes upon his immaculate shirt-front, with disastrous consequences. "I won't go—till we've found the treasure, or at least looked for it in every hole and corner. I don't believe there is any, myself."

"Treasure! Are you dippy, child—has this loneliness affected your brain?" inquired her sweetheart, solicitously, as he looked anxiously into the flushed and smudgy face of the girl of his affections.

Nancy laughed—so merrily, so musically that the sound thrilled his heart. "Oh, you old John-goose, you!" chided Nancy, "I'm not dippy—but it's a wonder my brain hasn't gone, that's a fact," she lowered her voice to a whisper. "It's been—Oh, John, it's something awful to live out in the country! If it hadn't been for those silly letters I wrote you I'd have gone bug-house, truly! And oh, John-dear, you are such a handsome man!"

"And you are such a beautiful girl!" responded John with enthusiasm," even with a smudge on your cheek and a cobweb on your nose!"

"If you'd been seeking treasure," chided Nancy, "your nose, I'm free to say, would have been stubbed, and cobwebbed, and scraped, till it wouldn't be recognizable as a human feature! Not if it had been in all the places mine has. Listen!"

And, as briefly as possible, for Eleanor was searching in a nearby chamber, Nancy told John of the story old Mrs. Warner had related—the story of the lost fifty thousand dollars in eagles and double eagles, supposed by the public to be confiscated by Yankees, and by Mrs. Warner to be hidden safely away in the walls, chimneys, garrets or cellars of Talcott House.

"Nonsense!" was John's only observation, as she ended the tale of how they—she and Eleanor—had been searching ever since. "Sheer absolute nonsense, every word of it! I've got that raise at last, young lady, and I've come for you—and by jinks, I'll have you if I have to tie you up and tote you away like a bundle of straw!"

Just then Eleanor, hearing voices, and wondering who on earth Nancy could be talking to, entered the room. Eleanor, too, had a smudge on her cheek—in fact, there were two smudges, and a cobweb trailed, veil-like, across her forehead. Evidently, she, too, had been treasure-seeking in dark corners.

Eleanor was paler than usual, and there were dark shadows under her eyes that told plainly of fatigue, showing the nervous strain under which she was laboring. "Mr. Carr! I am so glad to see you!" Eleanor held out her hands—very soiled little hands they were—impulsively. "I know—I just feel that you've come for Nancy, but, oh, I can't spare her just yet! If Nancy were to leave me right now, I don't believe I'd have the courage to search another inch!"

"No danger," averred Nancy, stoutly. "I've just informed him that I won't go till I get good and ready!"

"Miss Eleanor, you're not looking very rosy and strong," said John, anxiously. "Can't you give up this—er—work you are engaged in and go back to the city with Nancy for a while? Treasure'll keep, you know," he smiled at the word, his tones showing how lightly he esteemed the story of hidden wealth in the old walls, "and time flies mighty fast! You and Nancy pack up and let me take you back home—to New York—with me. She's got to marry me before long, for I'm to be a home-body now—I'm taken off the road at last, with a place with the firm that affords a good salary. Please say yes, Miss Eleanor!"

But, though Eleanor hesitated, Nancy spoke up at once. "Go right back home, if you've come out here to tempt us, John-boy," she scolded. "As soon as we've finished—made sure that not a square inch is overlooked, I'll telegraph you to come, and marry me without a frock to my back! For I won't wait a single, solitary day to make a trousseau—I'll let you spend your good money buying frocks after we're married. How'll you like that?"

"Dandy!" declared John Carr, enthusiastically, "what's my money for if it isn't to buy things for you? All right, ladies—I'll wait a reasonable length of time, but remember, a man's patience has limits!"

This settlement of the question being satisfactory, they lead him out on the porch, and went away to make themelves presentable—and to send Bahama, post-haste, to Mr. Jake Louder's store for certain groceries necessary for a company dinner, which was so perfectly delicious that John Carr declared they must take along the cook, when Eleanor, Nancy and he should set up housekeeping together in the city.

But Eleanor shook her head sadly, a pathetic little smile on the fair face that was getting thin and white with anxiety.

"Aunt Daphne and I belong down here, Mr. Carr; the city isn't for us—we'll live and die down here on the old plantation, I think, whether we find money or not—we'll manage somehow. But you and Nancy will come to visit me, and I will be so glad to visit you, in your beautiful, sunny bright rooms. Will you have a flat, or a house?"

"A house in the suburbs," promptly replied Nancy, "when we are able. Till then, a flat, of course—airy, and sunny and beautifully convenient—and the best room in it for you, Nellie, always!"

"Of course—sure!" agreed John Carr, heartily, "the best in the house for you, when you come."

They took a walk in the afternoon, Nancy and her John, and she poured out her heart to him on various subjects dear to both. And she confided to her sweetheart that the wish of her heart was to see young Muir and Eleanor friends.

"They were made for each other—positively ordained from the beginning of time," declared Nancy, "but, John-boy, how on earth am I to get Eleanor to come off her high horse and be friendly with the boy? It would be such a beautiful match! And Nancy sighed with a sense of her impotence to further the making of such a perfect alliance.

"Things like this always work themselves out, honey," cheered her John, secure in his own happiness, "just let 'em alone—they'll find a way."

"Which is all you know!" scoffed Nancy. "Eleanor Talcott is harder than any ten-penny nail, John Carr, when it comes to doing what she considers the right and proper thing. She'd die before she'd encourage him a single, solitary bit—unless she were to find the treasure."

"Stuff and nonsense!" denied John, "she'll never find the treasure—but, if her heart inclines toward that young multi-millionaire, be sure he'll find a way to win her—if he's half a man."

But, when her sweetheart left—after making the automobile wait just as long as possible—Nancy was not at all cheered by his optimistic predictions—she knew Eleanor better than that!

Of course, being broiling hot summer time, when there wasn't a thing on earth to shoot, David Muir had no business whatever at Green Lands. Nancy, therefore, strolling in the cool of the morning before her day's work at treasure-seeking should begin, was somewhat startled to hear a low whistle of flute-like quality, in a big live-oak over her head. Looking up, she was still more startled to see a man in the tree, smiling down upon her with great friendliness.

"Hey there!" spoke the bird-man, pleasantly. "Look out—I'm going to drop!" And he did, right at her feet, and seized her hands immediately, shaking them like the proverbial pump-handles.

"David Muir! What on earth brings you here?" gasped Nancy, overcome with surprise at his unexpected appearance.

"What on earth brings you here—in a cemetery?" grinned David, amiably. "I've been tracking you for some time, dodging behind bushes, and behaving in as highwayman-like manner as possible, till I 'treed' you, so to speak. How's the princess?"

"Sit down on that tombstone and I'll tell you everything," invited Nancy, brushing off a slab with her gown and promptly seating herself, upon which David Muir followed suit, in a very gingerly manner. "Doesn't look very reverent, sitting right on one of 'em," he commented, uneasily. "I never saw this place before—looks like a garden."

"It's really the only well-kept spot on our plantation," declared Nancy. "You needn't look towards the house—Eleanor can't see you for those trees—and she's already been here—comes every morning early to look around and see that everything is in beautiful order, as it was when we first inherited the property. Poor child, she can't seem to make anything grow but flowers; but they spring up like magic in her path."

"Flowers should always spring up in a goddess's path," murmured David, dreamily, his eyes wistfully roving towards the house, hopeful of seeing a glimpse of the goddess. "Is she well—and happy?"

"She's not very well, for we're both working ourselves to death. Don't I strike you as looking careworn and feeble?" inquired Nancy, smiling so that dimples raced merrily from their hiding places to disprove the assertion.

"You strike me as looking lovely beyond the dreams of—of anything," finished David Muir, lamely. "Except one other person, the loveliest lady my eyes have ever had the great good fortune to behold! And you're looking unusually——plump!"

"I'm not!" disclaimed Nancy, indignantly; all girls inclined to plumpness naturally resent such imputations. "I've lost—pounds and pounds, I know, if I had any scales to weigh on. But, oh, let me tell you the tale of our land-sorrows! Beats Prospero's sea-sorrow all to bits." And, with a reminiscent sigh, Nancy began; only to be interrupted by David.

"About that darned manager," he frowned, "I didn't know until he very carefully sent in his report, and I saw—seldom ever read the things—that he had made Miss Talcott pay for the few blades of green stuff her mule ate up. I came right away, as soon as I read it—thought maybe she'd see me and let me apologize and return the money. I gave that darn-fool manager a raking over the coals he'll not be likely to forget, too."

"It was awful," agreed Nancy, "and I felt like cussing him myself—I hope you did it thoroughly! But you must never, never mention the matter to Eleanor, for she'd never forgive you in the world—and she'd starve before she'd take the money back."

David Muir's face grew very solemn—so solemn that Nancy couldn't help laughing at its preternatural length.

"Cheer up—the worst is yet to come," she continued. "Of course, it was perfectly terrible about the mule—nasty old thing, he won't make corn enough to feed himself, let alone us! And I know that Eleanor's poor little balance in the savings-bank is too minute to be visible to the naked eye. But I also know Eleanor, very thoroughly, and I'm sure she would be grossly insulted if you were to offer reparation, in any way. No, my child, our lone lorn hope lies in finding the treasure!"

Then, breathlessly, for she knew Eleanor would be calling her presently, Nancy told him the story of their search for the gold—in eagles and double eagles, to the amount of fifty thousand dollars, which old Colonel Talcott had taken away, in ten leather bags, to hide on the plantation; of the skirmish in which both men were killed, and the treasure whisked away from mortal ken.

"I think, myself, our co-Yankees took it away with 'em," said Nancy, confidentially, "but since old Mrs. Warner made us that visit, we've searched—I've nearly butted my brains out tapping ceilings, and cricked my neck awry forever; my eyes are full of plaster, my hands of splinters, and my lungs are so choked up with dust that I'm liable to go off into a decline. And Eleanor! Well, she's worse than I am, because she's looked so much harder. If it were only possible to find it, you'd be a happy man, David Muir, for she'd be rich—not, of course, to compare to you millionaire people, but fifty thousand dollars would enable her to repair the house and grounds, and buy a pony-carriage, and—be neighborly with folks."

David Muir rose from the resting-place of Eleanor's ancestor, and walked, hands soberly in his pockets, back and forth in the narrow walk between the graves. At the fence, just beneath the live-oak tree in which he had climbed, was a tiny grave freshly mounded.

"New one?" he asked, absently smoothing the red clay with his toe.

"Old as the hills," returned Nancy. "It isn't one of the family, but some darkey who died in war times, and was buried here while the family were in town. Wanted to be near its white folks, poor soul. It was badly mounded, and Eleanor had Uncle Bahama mound it over. She calls it her poor little pickaninny, and tends it as lovingly as the others. See that fresh bunch of roses on it? Put them there this morning. Eleanor's too full of sentiment for a prosaic Yankee to understand!" And Nancy sighed helplessly, as she shook her head over Eleanor's perverse ways—"but I like it," she declared loyally. "I think she's the finest—the very finest girl on earth!"

"So do I," nodded David Muir, soberly, "so—do—I!"

"But so unpractical!" mourned Nancy.

"Yes," agreed David Muir, abstractedly. He sighed, held out his hand to Nancy with an air of finality, and said simply: "Good by, Miss Nancy—I'll see you again before long—must be going, now."

Then, lifting his hat, he climbed swiftly up the bole of the big live-oak, dropped down on the other side of the enclosure, and was gone before the astonished Nancy realized it.

"I think, declared that young lady, huffily, "that he isn't as much in love with Eleanor as he pretends—going off like that, without even trying to get a single glimpse of her. Well, men are queer, the best of 'em. I'll run back to the house and help hunt for Great-Uncle Talcott's money—oh, Lord, how my neck does ache!"

"But, after two weeks of search, the treasure was still undiscovered. Eleanor drooped like a white lily on which the rains and winds had beaten too harshly. Nancy, viewing her with the ache of pity in her heart, sighed impotently, and longed fiercely to be able to do something to comfort her—and thought of the absent David Muir with wrath in her soul. A real lover should stay near his lady in her time of distress, considered Nancy, even though the lady aforesaid would have none of him.

But, when she went to fish her mail from the box down the road one day, there was an envelope addressed in unfamiliar writing which puzzled her. Tearing it open, she read: "Meet me in the morning, at any hour that suits you, in the graveyard—I'll be up the tree. D. M."

Wondering at this summons, yet eager to obey, Nancy waited impatiently for Eleanor to return from her usual early morning visit to the little cemetery, and, as soon as she could, flew on the winged feet of curiosity to the trysting place.

David was already up the tree, and he sprang down instantly.

"I saw her—she looks so pale it frightened me," he said, in greeting. "Poor child, just wearing her life away. But say, partner, a thought came to me, away up in New York, and, by George, I believe I've got a hunch that's genuine! Listen: I've been thinking that, if there is such a thing as hidden treasure, you've both been on the wrong trail. Now this is my hunch—what do you think about it?"

And, speaking in a confidentially lowered voice, though there were none to hear, he told Nancy, in graphic words, about the "hunch" as to the hiding-place of the treasure.

Nancy sank weakly upon an ancient tombstone, overcome with surprise at the daring thing he suggested.

"I couldn't—I don't believe she'd ever con-

Comfort Sisters' Corner

have genuine home folks just across the bay in Oakland.

And I want letters from some of the dear old Grandmas who feel they haven't much to do in life from now on but patiently wait for the end. Many families here are glad to get an elderly woman in their family for light housework and to mind small children so they may get out of an evening or Sunday.

Girls who come here from the East should get in touch with thoroughly reliable people before taking work as they might find themselves behind locked doors in a den of shame. There have never been better openings for girls than at present, in all lines of work, and the girl who will ask references from the pastor of some church here as to the one offering her employment when she comes; and the girl putting herself under the guard of the Travelers' Aid enroute, and positively refusing all advances of strangers, both male and female on trains and at waiting rooms, will arrive safely night or day and be met by the Aid's agent on her arrival and taken to her place. There is no need of thousands of our precious girls constantly disappearing, going out into the dark unknown as they are doing. I am confident if they would deport themselves properly, dress more modestly, and keep eyes, ears and other senses on the alert, they could neither be persuaded off the train nor to eat or drink with a stranger.

Working girls or boys, write to me if I can help you in any way.

Who wants a Christmas Card?

MRS. I. G. AULD.

SOMEWHERE IN ILLINOIS.

DEAR PEOPLE OF THE COMFORT SISTERS' CORNER:

May I come in? I didn't come in to talk about myself despite the fact that I have a lot of pet troubles that need airing. The main reason I called was to tell Bachelor Bill what I thought of him. Well, if my right-hand neighbor isn't Bachelor Bill. Bill, why are you so cruel toward my sex? Why put all the blame on their shoulders? I wish you could be turned into a woman for a while. How do you think a woman can always be neat and clean when she has to care for three or four children, do the housework, care for a garden and do part of her husband's work? There isn't any use to try to explain this to a man. I am not so very old but, Bachelor Bill most of the trouble I have seen in the families of my friends has been caused by men. Because a woman loves a man she will try hard all day to please him, forgetting to give herself the care that is needed to keep her "sweet." I don't want to quarrel with you nor say you don't know what you are talking about but I do want to defend my sex. Men will throw their clothes on the floor, leave their hat on the table and spill ashes and ink on the table linen. Perhaps the wife will have a few spare minutes in which she plans to comb her hair but there are the clothes to pick up, the hat to put away, the ashes to sweep up and the stain to be removed from the table linen. So the hair isn't combed and then she's "untidy."

I have had a hard road in this life and every one of my troubles and hardships can be traced to a man. Of course there are exceptions but I haven't seen them.

A BIRD WITH A BROKEN WING.

NORTH CAROLINA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT ever since I was a child but this is the first time I have ever attempted to write to the Sisters' Corner, for the simple reason that I knew my letter wouldn't be as interesting as those written by others, but when I read the letters from Appreciative and Sincere Reader on adopting children I could keep silent no longer. By all means adopt a child for you can and will love it just as dearly as your very own. We know for we adopted a dear little boy when he was only three weeks old and now he is nearly twenty-one months old and a perfect darling. We had only one child of our own, a dear little boy of eight, and I am sending their pictures which I hope to see in COMFORT. We love our adopted baby, little John Farish, just as much as we love our own, Wesley Osborn, so by all means adopt a child and see just how much your home will be brightened and cheered and how dearly you will love it.

Sincerely, A COMFORT FRIEND.

TOREY, UTAH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Will you let a Mormon sister enter your happy corner? I have never seen a letter from Utah. I wonder why?

I enjoyed Bonnie V. Bovell's letter. I am another mother with a crushed heart, having to part with dear children. I was blessed with five but have only two left, the eldest, eleven years and the baby nine months old, so those that are gone were just babies but they brought their love and we miss them so.

Our little girl of eight years was the picture of health and the life of home but she took that dreadful influenza and passed away last December, ten days before Christmas, and oh, such a lonesome Christmas as it was. I try to think of this story: A Hindu woman, the beautiful Eastern tells us, lost her only child. Wild with grief, she implored a prophet to give back her little one to her. He looked at her for a long while and then said tenderly, "Go, my daughter, bring me a handful of rice from a house into which death has never entered and I will do as thou desireth." The woman at once began her search. She went from dwelling to dwelling and had no difficulty in obtaining what the prophet specified but when they granted it she inquired, "Are you all around the hearth, father, mother, children, none missing?" But the people shook their heads, with sighs and looks of sadness and far and wide as she wandered there was always some vacant seat by the hearth. And gradually as she passed on the waves of her grief subsided before the spectacle of sorrow everywhere. And her heart, ceasing to be occupied with its own sorrow, flowed out in strong sympathy with the universal suffering; tears of anguish softened into tears of pity; she forgot self and found joy in helping others.

I would like to hear from some of the sisters of COMFORT as I get very downhearted at times, although I have one of the best husbands on earth. I don't think we should talk of our husband's faults. Stop a minute and look at yourselves.

I am living on a large cattle ranch, keeping house for my husband and children. We are surrounded by high cliffs and on the east is a large mountain. It is a rough country but we enjoy life here during the summer. In the winter we go to town so our children can go to school. The Mormons are great people for schools. Today in the public school system of the to outwit me, my pretty little sister, but I am going to hunt you out yet, and then I'll pay you a social call."

Violet was filled with dismay at this threat, for she could conceive of nothing more mortifying and embarrassing than that Wilhelm Meneke, with his bloated and disfigured face, his soiled and untidy apparel, should present himself at the aristocratic residence of Mr. Lawrence on Fifth Avenue and claim relationship with her.

She quickly retraced her steps to Broadway, bitterly regretting that she had left that street at all, and then she walked swiftly on up town until she was sure that Wilhelm Mencke could not see her, when she took a car and went home, resolving that she would be very careful hereafter about being found in that portion of the city alone.

Wilhelm Mencke, after the last tempestuous interview with his wife in London, suddenly made up his mind that it would be as good a time as any to shirk all future obligations of a domestic nature, and accordingly he took "French leave," proceeding directly to Glasgow, where he secured a cheap passage in a steamer bound for the United States.

Arriving in New York, he reasoned that he could lose himself there more successfully than anywhere else, and, securing a lodging in one of the poorer sections of the city, he devoted th most of his days to sleep and beer-drinking, and his nights to gambling, the passion for which had become insatiable.

Sometimes he won: at others he lost; at any rate he led a miserable existence, sinking lower and lower in the mire of indolence and dissipation, losing his self-respect—what little he originally possessed—and becoming a voluntary outcast from all respectable society.

Violet was exceedingly disturbed by her meeting with him and for a long time afterward she could not be persuaded to go out, even to ride, so afraid was she of another encounter with him.

Her excuse to Mr. Lawrence, whenever he invited her to accompany himself and Bertha anywhere, was that a dressmaker and necessary spring sewing claimed her time and presence; therefore, that gentleman and his daughter were obliged to drive by themselves during the next few weeks. She continued to devote herself assiduously to her duties in the schoolroom, so that the master of the house seldom saw her, excepting at dinner time, and this caused him no little uneasiness and chagrin, because he had been gradually growing to realize, of late, that her companionship had become necessary to his happiness.

One evening he was sitting alone in his library, and he fell to musing upon his uncomfortable state of affairs.

"I suppose it is because of her extreme conscientiousness," he told himself. "She thinks because she is hired for certain duties she must not be tempted from them for her own personal enjoyment. Hum! She is a charming little body, a perfect sunbeam in the house—why shouldn't I keep her here always? I am a middle-aged man, I know, but my heart is young, and I love young company. I wonder if it would be right to ask her to share the future with me. She seems to be alone in the world, she receives no letters—no friends come to visit her, and I have never heard her speak of a relative. It almost seems as if there must be some mystery connected with her history; but she is good and true, I am sure, for her daily life is beyond reproach. Her tastes are dainty and refined, her education excellent, her manners charming, and in person she is certainly very beautiful: she would make a most delightful mistress for such a home as this, and why should I not marry her if I can win her? True, I am old enough to be her father, but older men than I have married even younger girls than Violet. I could give her every luxury, and shield her from every ill, while, should she outlive me, as she probably will, she would have a handsome fortune at her disposal."

The wealthy banker sat long considering the wisdom of offering his hand to the young governess. Evidently Violet had no prior attachment, he thought: she seemed happy and contented in his home and appeared to love Bertha most tenderly, while, on the other hand, the child was devotedly attached to her.

Before he had retired to rest, he had resolved to do his utmost to induce Violet to become his wife.

"I will not interfere with her duties now," he mused, "for she thinks there have already been too many interruptions to the lessons; but we shall soon go away from the city for the summer—which I will try to make one long delightful holiday for her and Bertha—and when she resumes her place in this household, I hope it will be upon an entirely different footing."

A little later he broached the subject of going away for the summer to his residence up the Hudson, and the bright look which illuminated Violet's face at the thought of going into the country, assured him that he could not have proposed a greater pleasure for her.

But their eyes suddenly lost their gladness, for it occurred to her that possibly Mr. Lawrence had not thought of including her in his plans for the season, and she had no idea what she should do, or where to go if she should be left behind.

But his next words reassured her upon that point, and set her heart beating with hope and delight.

"Are you fond of the country, Miss Huntington?" he asked, wondering with some misgiving, what had made her grow so grave all at once.

"Yes, indeed; in the summer there is nothing more delightful than the country," she answered, eagerly.

"I am glad to hear you say that, for I have been wondering if we could persuade you to go with us when we leave town," the wily banker returned, making it appear that she would be doing them a favor by going with them. "Would you prefer a summer on the Hudson or a sojourn by the sea? I have also a villa upon Long Island," he pursued, watching the play of her features to see if she really had any choice in the matter.

Violet dearly loved the sea, as we already know; but she liked the highlands also, and she hesitated a moment before replying.

"I am sure I should be very happy in either place," she at length said, with a smile, "and I should rather not express a preference; that ought to be as you and Miss Bertha desire, I think."

He smiled at her modesty, then after considering the point, remarked:

"We will go to Oak Heights on the Hudson for the remainder of this month and next; then we will spend August and September by the sea. How will that suit, Miss Bertha?"

But his eyes were fixed on Violet's glowing face as he put the question.

"That will be very nice, papa," the child replied, delightedly, "and I know we shall have a much pleasanter time this summer than we did last, if Miss Huntington is to go with us, for nothing ever gets out of fix or goes wrong where she is."

Mr. Lawrence gave vent to a low, appreciative laugh at this remark, and thought that Bertha certainly had the right of it.

"Thank you, dear," said Violet, flushing, while she laid her hand caressingly upon the child's shoulder. "I ought to feel very highly complimented with such a tribute as that, and I am sure I am charmed with the plan for the summer. I had hardly given a thought to what was going to become of me during vacation time; I did not realize it was so near."

"I don't think we could get along without you," Bertha returned, affectionately; "do you, papa?"

Mr. Lawrence flushed at this.

"I think it will be very pleasant for us all to have Miss Huntington with us," he said, quietly.

A week later they were all settled in their beautiful home on the Hudson, and Violet felt more content and at ease than at any time since her disagreeable encounter with Wilhelm Mencke.

She had lived in constant fear that he would find out where she resided and make himself obnoxious, both to her and to Mr. Lawrence; but now she was sure that he would never think of looking for her in any place so far away from the city, and she gave herself up with all her heart to the enjoyment of her holiday.

Mr. Lawrence insisted that there should be no lessons during the vacation season.

Violet looked blank at this injunction, and told him that she feared she should not be doing her duty to spend the summer in idleness.

"Just give up the time to getting strong and vigorous for work when you return," Mr. Lawrence said, pleasantly. "I will provide you with all the amusing reading that you desire for yourself and Bertha, and you may give me all the music that you will; but there shall be no regular routine, no set duties. Make yourself and Bertha happy, and I shall be more than satisfied."

"I imagine there are very few governesses who are like this," Violet mused, when thinking over her patron's kindness afterward. "I am sure Mr. Lawrence must be a man in a thousand, and I believe I am beginning to be very fond of him. If Wilhelm had only been like him, how happy I might have been in my own home—all the sad experiences of last year would never have come upon me," she concluded, with a heavy sigh. Mr. Lawrence not only gave Violet and her charge permission to be happy, but he exerted himself in every possible way to contribute toward this result.

He planned long, delightful rides during the early morning, after which they would sit in the cool shade of one of the mammoth trees on the lawn, while either Mr. Lawrence or Violet read aloud from some entertaining book. After luncheon, or during the warmest portion of the day, they rested; then in the cool of the evening they would ride again, either in the carriage or on horseback—for Mr. Lawrence owned some fine saddle-horses—or take a delightful sail upon the river.

Violet had never been so happy since her early childhood; life was like a beautiful poem—a dream of delight.

There was only one drawback to it all: the shadow of death—the supposed untimely death of her young husband—still hung over her, saddening many hours and causing many bitter tears.

"Oh, if Wallace were only here to share all this with me! How can I bear all the long, lonely years before me?" was the sad lament which too often escaped her lips.

But, though her grief was strong and deep-seated, she kept it to herself. She never mentioned that she had any secret trouble, nor referred in any way to her past.

Then the summer months glided by, and Violet was more than content to feel that she was doing good, in helping to form a lovely and noble character in the motherless and afflicted child who had been committed to her care; this thought was like a silver fringe to the cloud which shadowed her own life.

Every day, too, spent in Mr. Lawrence's society, revealed more and more that was grand and chivalrous in his nature, and she grew to look up to and regard him much as an elder daughter might regard a fond, kind father, never once suspecting that he was cherishing a warmer sentiment for her, and planning to offer her the first place in his heart and his home.

The first week in August they removed to the villa on Long Island, and here eight weeks more were spent in an equally delightful manner.

They all loved the sea, and much of their time was passed upon it in yacht or sailboat, or strolling along the beach upon its margin.

At one time they made a three weeks' excursion in a yacht, with some of Mr. Lawrence's friends, who occupied a villa next their own; thus Violet made some acquaintances; and during these two months she saw more of society than she had since her flight from Mentone.

Mr. Lawrence accepted several invitations to dinners and receptions, and also entertained a number of times, for, as it happened, a great many people whom he knew had come to spend the summer in that vicinity.

Violet and Bertha were always present upon these occasions, Violet doing the honors, like an elder daughter, with charming grace and ease, thus betraying that she had always been accustomed to moving in cultivated circles.

The eyes of some of Mr. Lawrence's friends began to be opened after two or three of these receptions, for the marked attention which that gentleman bestowed upon his beautiful governess could not fail to excite comment.

"She may hold the post of governess in his family for the present, but if she does not occupy the position of mistress before the year is out, I am no judge of the signs of the times," one gentleman remarked to another, after spending a delightful evening at the Villa, where Violet had charmed them with her music and her rare conversational powers.

"She is certainly a beautiful and accomplished woman," was the thoughtful reply, "but it does not seem right to me that one so young should marry a man so many years her senior."

"Well, it is not exactly according to nature," returned the first speaker, "and yet there is something to be said for, as well as against, such a union. If I had a lovely daughter, like Miss Huntington, I would much prefer she would marry a man of Horace Lawrence's stamp, for he is an honorable and cultivated gentleman, than any of the majority of brainless, idle fellows who frequent society nowadays. He would love her better, shield her more tenderly, and make her happier."

"You may be right—but I hope she will not marry him, all the same," was the grave response. Then he added, with a sudden brightening up of his face: "I know just the young man whom a girl like that ought to marry—who would make just the kind of a husband she ought to win."

"I shall begin to think that you are turning matchmaker, my friend," laughed the first speaker, or match-spoiler, I'm afraid my friend Lawrence might say. Who is this young paragon of the nineteenth century?"

"What, young Richardson!"

"Yes; they would make an ideal couple, according to my way of thinking," answered Mr. Harlow, "for, strange as it may seem, Wallace's partner was spending a few weeks in that vicinity, and a mutual friend had introduced him to Mr. Lawrence, and thus he met Violet.

"It is not often that two ideals marry each other," replied his friend, smiling. "The way the world goes in the majority of instances, some miserable stick gets one of the nicest little wives in the world, and vice versa. Perhaps, however, there is a wise economy in the arrangement: but matrimony, worked out on that line, is a problem to puzzle a better brain than mine. Still, as you say, Richardson is an ideal fellow—one in a thousand; only he seems older than his years; he has had some trouble, hasn't he?"

"Yes, but I don't know the nature of it exactly; he is very reticent; and, of course, I would not attempt to force his confidence. I wish, though, he had a nice wife; I would really like to introduce him to this charming Miss Huntington," Mr. Harlow remarked with an earnestness that made his friend smile again at his taste for matchmaking.

Violet should have thus flowed so near each other without touching; but so it often is in this world of cross-purposes and mysteries.

CHAPTER XXIII.

WILHELM MENCKE MAKES TWO DISCOVERIES.

One day Mr. Lawrence came home early, bringing tickets for a matinee of the opera "Martha." He was ever ready to gratify Bertha's passionate love of music by giving her an opportunity to hear all the best talent, and during the season they made it a point of attending some performance once or twice every week, while Miss Bertha, supplied with a pair of powerful glasses that had been made especially for her, was in her element upon these occasions.

They were to hear a favorite artist today, and all appeared to be in the best of spirits in anticipation of the treat in store for them.

Violet was looking unusually pretty, in spite of her somber attire, for, although she had never assumed the mourning of a widow, she had dressed in black, or white, ever since her flight from Mentone.

It was very becoming to her, with her golden hair and fair complexion, and today there was a finer color than usual in her cheeks, while she wore a corsage bouquet of exquisite chrysanthemums, white as clustered snowflakes, which Mr. Lawrence had brought home to her, and many an eye turned a second admiring glance upon her as she alighted from the elegant carriage of her escort and followed him into the Academy of Music.

There was one pair of eyes which lighted with a quick flash of triumph as they caught sight of and recognized her.

They belonged to a bloated, gross-looking man, who was lounging in the shadow of a billboard, watching, with a sort of stolid curiosity, the arrival of the many pleasure-seekers, and who exclaimed, with a chuckle of exultation, as the girl disappeared from view.

"Aha, my pretty Violet, at last I have cornered you!"

It was, as may be surmised, no other than Wilhelm Mencke, more coarse, more repulsive than ever, and for six months he had been vainly trying to ferret out Violet, whom he had begun to fear had left the city, for he had never caught a second glimpse of her until this moment.

Having made this important and unexpected discovery, his next thought was to ascertain the name of the gentleman with whom he had seen her, and, with this end in view, he sauntered leisurely out from his hiding-place toward the elegant turnout from which Violet had just alighted, and which he affected to admire exceedingly.

"Humph! A fine pair of horses you have there," he remarked to the dignified coachman upon the box, as he patted the satin-smooth neck of the animal nearest him. "It must be rather enjoyable to drive a couple of high-steppers like these; they cost a cool thousand, I'll warrant."

The high-toned driver bestowed a somewhat scornful glance upon the shabby, vulgar-looking man; but no lover of good horseflesh can listen to such praise of the objects of his especial pride and be indifferent to the flattery.

"There an't a better pair o' carriage horses in New York," he said, briefly, bestowing an affectionate glance upon the handsome bays.

"They're beauties, that's a fact," said Wilhelm Mencke, admiringly; "the whole turnout isn't to be sneezed at. Your governor must have plenty of cash to sport it—a good judge of horseflesh, too. Do you mind telling me who's the owner?"

"H. A. Lawrence, Esq.," was the curt but somewhat consequential reply.

"What! The banker?"

"Yes."

"Oho! I've heard of him. Where does he live?"

"No. — Fifth Avenue."

"Whew! Rich, isn't he?"

"Rather!" replied the coachman, loftily, and with significant emphasis upon the adverb, as he gathered up his reins preparatory to driving on, while Wilhelm Mencke, having accomplished his object, waddled toward the Academy of Music entrance, where, after purchasing a ticket and securing a pair of glasses, he sought his seat in the second circle and set himself at work to seek Violet in the dense throng beneath him, and watch her movements throughout the entertainment.

He espied her after a while, sitting in the front row of the first balcony, and from that moment he scarcely took his eyes from her face until the opera was over, when he hastened out, and taking up his position again behind the billboard, watched until Mr. Lawrence's party emerged from the building, and, entering their carriage, drove away.

Then, with a jubilant chuckle over his cleverness, and planning to make his discovery work to his own advantage, the man went on his way toward his own miserable quarters.

Proceeding slowly down the street, in an opposite direction from that taken by Mr. Lawrence's driver, and revolving how he could best make Violet a means to bring him money, his eye chanced to light upon a sign which had never attracted his attention before, although he had passed that way many times.

"Harlow & Richardson, Architects," he read, and then stopping short, he stared blankly at the names for several moments.

"Richardson! Richardson! It can't be possible that it is that chap," he muttered, with a scowl. "If he is here in the city and they should come together, my fat would be all in the fire. I've got to make my wits support me, and Violet, being in the family, is legitimate prey. She believes that young Richardson is dead, and it will be for my interest to have her continue to think so. I must look this matter up."

It was after five o'clock, but, though the man was suffering for his usual drink, he was so eager to satisfy his curiosity regarding the firm whose sign he had just discovered, he decided to forego the gratification of his appetite for a season, and learn the truth of his suspicions.

He therefore posted himself in a doorway, near by, to watch the entrance to the architects' office, for, he reasoned, work hours were nearly over, and both clerks and employers would soon be going home for the night.

Nor was he disappointed for in less than fifteen minutes a young man of perhaps twenty years issued from the building, and Wilhelm Mencke, assuming as respectable an air as possible, accosted him and inquired if either Mr. Harlow or Mr. Richardson was in the office.

"Yes," the clerk replied, regarding his questioner somewhat curiously; "Mr. Richardson came in about half an hour ago."

"Is it too late to consult with him upon a matter of business?" Mr. Mencke inquired.

"No—I think he could attend to you, if you wish to see him, although he has had a very busy day."

"All right; thank you—I think I'll go up. By the way," added Mr. Mencke, as he was about to enter the building, "what is Mr. Richardson's full name?"

"W. H. Richardson."

"Ah, yes; the W. is for Wallace, I believe—that is, if he is the man I used to know. Quite a young man, isn't he?"

"About twenty-four or five, I should say," returned the clerk, wondering what the gentlemanly and dignified Mr. Richardson should ever have had in common with this coarse-looking man.

"Smart fellow, or used to be," remarked Mr. Mencke, sententiously.

"Indeed he is," animatedly returned the young man, with whom Wallace was evidently a great favorite, "there are few men of his age who are so well posted in their profession as Mr. Richardson is, both theoretically and practically."

"That is so, that is so," said Wilhelm Mencke, wisely, as if he were thoroughly acquainted with Wallace's accomplishments. "The firm is doing a good business, I suppose?"

"Yes, indeed, their business has increased nearly fifty per cent during the last year, and they have more orders for the next twelve months than they can fill, unless they increase their office force."

"Well, well, they must be getting rich, then," said the inquisitive Mencke, but none too well pleased with the information he had gained.

"Yes, if business continues as good during the next five years they will make their fortune; but," added the voluble young man, beginning to think he was talking too freely of his employers' affairs, "it is my grub time and I must be off. You'll find Mr. Richardson up one flight, first door on the right. Good evening," and turning abruptly away, he walked rapidly down the street.

Wilhelm Mencke felt far from comfortable standing out there in the cold, in his thin overcoat and otherwise shabby attire, after gaining the above information.

He, who had once lived in affluence and scorned this rising young architect on account of his poverty, was now homeless, almost penniless, and shivering with cold outside the elegant building, where the man whom he had hated and had wronged, was steadily mounting the ladder of prosperity, and building up a name and fame that promised to shine among the brightest lights of his profession.

These thoughts were humiliating in the extreme, and made him shrink and cringe with mortification, envy and anger.

"I'd like to see for myself how he is getting on," he muttered, with a sullen frown. "I've half a mind to go inside and wait until he comes out."

He entered the building, and began slowly to mount the stairs, marking, as he went, the handsomely furnished and well-lighted hall.

"'Up one flight, first door on the right,'" he repeated, musingly, "must cost something for office rent in a building like this."

He had reached the second landing, but for some reason, or from some oversight, this hall had not yet been lighted, and was comparatively dark. The neglect, however, proved better for Wilhelm Mencke's purpose, for upon reaching the door to which he had been directed, and finding that the upper panels were of glass, he could plainly see the interior of the architects' office, and all that was going on therein.

It was a handsome apartment, large, airy, well furnished and brilliantly lighted. There were four or five draughting-tables or desks standing in different portions of the room. A pretty carpet of modest colors was upon the floor, a few comfortable-looking chairs, with handsomely carved backs and substantial make, were scattered about, while a few fine engravings, richly framed, hung upon the walls.

Opposite him, and with the door standing open, there was another room—evidently a private office—and this, what he could see of it, was even more luxuriously furnished.

"What a jump for that young beggar to make in less than two years!" muttered the whilom pork-packer, with an angry scowl, "and there he is now, as I am alive," he continued, as a fine-looking, well-dressed gentleman suddenly emerged from the inner room, and approached a clerk sitting at one of the desks.

Yes, it was indeed Wallace, looking more manly than ever, yet with a certain air about him which told that he had known sorrow. His bearing was gentlemanly and dignified, and it was plainly to be seen that the clerk, though he was an older man than himself, regarded him with deep respect and good will.

Wallace finished what he had to say to his clerk—which was evidently something connected with the drawings he was working upon—and then disappeared again within his private office.

He reappeared, however, almost immediately, wearing a handsome overcoat, and with his hat in his hand, while he was closely followed by another man.

"Lord Cameron, as sure as I'm a Dutchman!" cried the watcher outside, under his breath, and he saw that they were making directly for the door where he stood.

He shuffled away from his position, around to the foot of the next flight of stairs, where he would be concealed from their sight, and the next moment Wallace and his companion emerged from the office.

"Richardson, I am delighted over your success," the listener heard Lord Cameron say, as the two young men went down stairs together. "You are fast mounting to the top of the ladder and I shall expect to find you at the very summit the next time I come to America."

"Well, of course, I intend to improve my opportunities to the utmost," Wallace replied. "It has always been my aim to do thoroughly whatever I undertake, and I mean to attain to as fine a position and make my name as famous as possible. But," with a heavy sigh, "beyond the satisfaction to be gained by conquering difficulties and achieving my object, it will not amount to much, for I have no one with whom to share my honors."

Lord Cameron made some low-voiced, sympathetic reply, which Wilhelm Mencke could not catch, though he strained his ears to their utmost to do so and then the two friends, arm-in-arm, went forth into the street.

The eavesdropper hastened after them as fast as his bulky proportions would permit, and followed them up town for some distance, and finally saw them enter the Windsor Hotel together.

It is impossible to describe the feeling of mingled humiliation and spleen which raged in the heart of Wilhelm Mencke, as he watched them disappear within the brilliantly lighted entrance, into warmth and luxury, while he turned down a side street and made his way toward the miserable and comfortless room which was now his only home. The contrast of his present position with that of the young man, whom he had held in such contempt two years previous, was mortifying and terribly exasperating to his jealous nature.

He had always recognized the fact that Wallace was, by far, his superior in point of intellect, natural refinement and culture, while, as far as personal appearance was concerned, he certainly was not a gainer by comparison.

Wallace had been reared under the refining influence of cultured and Christian parents, and this advantage had served to mould his whole life, keeping him pure and noble, even in the midst of poverty and hardships.

Wilhelm Mencke, on the other hand, had drifted to Cincinnati, a coarse, unlettered youth, whose early life had been tainted by the example of an intemperate father and mother, and whose chief aim was to get rich, no matter how. He had found employment in a pork-packing establishment, and finally won a foothold in the family of his employer by consummating an elopement with his daughter, whose fortune and assured position had alone given him the entree to the better circles of the city.

But, with his money all wasted and left to himself, his real nature now asserted itself, and he sank to the level from which he had sprung.

Still he had pride enough left to sting him severely when he was compelled to realize the contrast of his present position with that of the once "poverty-stricken carpenter," who had dared to aspire to the hand of his wife's sister.

"It is very strange that he and Violet should have both been in New York for so many months and never met," he muttered, as he went on his way. "They shall not meet if I can help it. I hate the young upstart, and I will do all I can to keep them apart. I can manage to bleed both of them in this way, perhaps, while I could never get a penny from either if they should come together; for Violet hasn't much love for me now, and would never forgive me if she should discover how she had been deceived about his death. It is lucky for me that I have those trinkets, which I helped myself to before I left London. It is a wonder, though, that I have never pawned them; but somehow she seemed to haunt me whenever I thought of doing so; but I'll warrant he'll pay me well for them—poor lackadaisical fool! 'No one to share his honors'—bah! It is lucky for him that he does not think of marrying one of the fine girls of New York. I wish he would take a notion to; he'd be in a fine pickle then, and I should have a nice hold upon him—I could bleed him then within an inch of his life."

Fortunes Founded Through Luck

FRANK W. WOOLWORTH.

THE tallest building on earth is on the world's greatest highway, Broadway, New York. Frank W. Woolworth built this "Cathedral of Commerce" and the $7,000,000 it cost him represents but a part of his large fortune. It was a piece of luck—a mere chance—that led to the accumulation of the Woolworth riches.

FRANK W. WOOLWORTH.

Woolworth, when he was about 27, was clerking in a little country store in New York State, close to his birthplace, Rodman. He was active and industrious, and a very wide-awake young man, liked by his customers and by his employers. Now one morning in dropped a Western merchant who, among many other things, told of how successful he had been with a new idea—a five-cent counter in his store. "It was a hummer, while it lasted," he said.

Hearing and remembering the merchant's yarn was Woolworth's luck. The day's work over, he recalled the story in all its detail, and it was not long before he was on the track of a great idea. He would go to New York, where he would be sure to find plenty of articles to buy and sell at five cents, and then he would open a five-cent store of his own! He had heard of the business axiom, "Small Profits and Quick Returns," and he determined if possible to try it out. He was sure he had the right idea, and the more he pondered it the more excited he got—in fact he couldn't sleep that night.

Next day he took his employers into his confidence, for he hadn't a cent of capital. They liked Frank, he was honest, capable and courteous, but they wouldn't loan him any money. They were willing, however, to let him have a bill of goods on credit. This, with a little money he managed to borrow among his friends, enabled him to rent half a store in Utica where he started his five-cent counter.

As he expected, it drew big crowds and his whole stock of five-cent articles went the first day. But a formidable difficulty soon loomed up. He couldn't go on selling the same articles day after day for everybody was supplied, and the difficulty was to get different articles, yet so cheap that he could sell them for a nickel. This, he recalled, was the same difficulty the Western merchant had spoken of running up against.

How to get over it taxed Woolworth's brain not a little, meantime his sales dwindled, for people when they saw the same old articles day after day and no novelties, turned away. He knew of course that he must have variety, and that variety couldn't be had at such a low price.

Then the idea suddenly flashed upon him to try a 10-cent counter!

The 10-cent counter was the answer to his puzzle—his snowball was at last on the move downhill, doubling in size every foot.

And this is how, through a lucky incident, F. W. Woolworth made his millions; and today, in the United States, Canada and Great Britain, he is successfully running more than 800 10-cent stores.

The S. P. Q. R. axiom turned out a "winner" for Woolworth.

Driven Apart

and had gone to the sitting-room for some books and music and other things, when Mr. Jackman came. He seemed distressed at the thought of my leaving, and wished to pledge my new-found happiness in a glass of wine. I drank a little of what he gave me, and in a few moments felt strangely dizzy and sleepy."

"The wine was drugged," ground Neil between his teeth. "The treacherous scoundrel!"

"It must have been drugged," faltered Beryl, "for after regaining my room, and dropping upon my bed, I remember nothing more until—until now. It was not noon then, yet here it is night. I must have lain in a stupor for many hours."

"You received no note purporting to come from me?" Neil asked, indignation and anger thrilling in his tones.

"No," answered Beryl. "Did you send me a note, dear?"

"I did not; but when I called for you, Jackman showed me a note which, he said, you had received, and which, he also informed me, he had picked up on the stairs. That note requested you to accompany the bearer to San Jose, and was signed with my name. I marveled at the time how you could have been deceived by the handwriting; still, believing that Jackman was your true friend, I did not doubt him at the moment, but turned to hurry back to the town in an effort to find you. I see now," he finished bitterly, "that the note was a decoy for me and not for you. I was to be lured away on a false scent, while Berdyne came for you in this car."

Beryl shivered with the horror of it all.

"Oh, how could men prove so treacherous, so void of honor!" she cried, with a half sob. "Mr. Jackman—it is hard for me to believe that he would lend his aid to anything so despicable."

"I am glad that I was able to pluck you out of that fateful snare," said Neil. "My poor darling! For months you have been surrounded by enemies. We may thank a merciful Providence that you came off so well. I might never have been able to rescue you, had it not been for Tonita."

Beryl leaned over and kissed Tonita's cheek.

"At least," said she tenderly, "I had one true friend among all my foes; and I cannot help thinking that all would have been different if Mother Jackman had been at home."

Tonita drew Beryl closer to her breast.

"To the death, querida," said the Mexican girl; "you can always depend upon your Tonita."

"Pray tell me all that happened," said Beryl, nestling comfortably into half of Tonita's cloak, which was drawn around her.

Neil and Tonita, between them, went into details of recent events, and Beryl was thrilled by the recital. Her peril had been great, yet Tonita's cleverness and Neil's courage had saved her from a fate that was worse than death. A prayer of thankfulness went up from her heart to the Father who watches over the innocent and the unfortunate.

"And in this same automobile which was to carry me away with Mr. Berdyne," murmured Beryl, "I am now speeding out of the hateful power of my foes with my true love and my dear friend. Heaven, indeed, has been good to me! And we are bound——"

"To San Francisco," Neil called back, "to the house of the minister who is to give me the legal right to defend you from scoundrels like Berdyne and Trenwyck. We had nearly fifty miles before us at the start. I have been over the road in a touring car before, and, if we have no breakdown, or other mishaps, we shall reach our destination by daylight. In the morning you shall be my bride!"

The last words found a delicious echo in Beryl's fluttering heart. They thrilled, too, like solemn music through the bosom of the Mexicana. In the great Leland Stanford University, at Palo Alto, her lover—a noble youth of her own race was studying to fit himself for the law. Some time they, too, like Beryl and Neil, would join their hands in wedlock.

"My trunk, my clothes, all my little store of goods," said Beryl, in dismay, the feminine instinct rising strong within her, "have been left at Sunset Ranch!"

"Pray consider me, dear," said Tonita gayly, "for I am but little better off. I came merely to make you a call, to do what I could to solve the mystery that had suddenly surrounded you, and behold! I am embarked on a journey just as I was and am to be your bridesmaid."

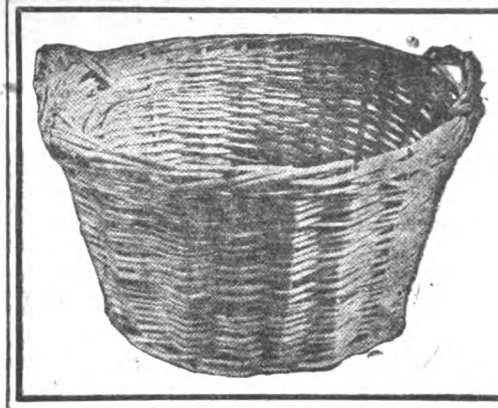
Neil laughed cheerily.

"Nothing shall delay us," said he, "until the ceremony is performed. After that, we shall visit some of the great stores, and what you ladies need it shall be my pleasure to provide. Tonita shall telegraph to her people that all is well with her, and there shall be many days of happiness for us in the City of the Golden Gate.

And on and on they flew, with Love, vigilant and determined, at the steering wheel; on through moonbeam and starbeam, along tree-lined avenues and dusky groves; on through the sleepy languor of the night, past Redwood City, San Carlos, Belmont, San Mateo, Burlingham, Palo Alto—little recking that, before many many hours vine-clad cottage, stately villa, palaces, and princely marts would be riven and torn, and the very road over which they were passing fissured and gashed.

They halted but once, and then at a wayside tarrying place, quaintly known as "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Here Neil secured some refreshments for his fair charges. A few moments after the journey was resumed, the tired girls were nodding drowsily in each other's arms.

Neil, alert, watchful, and tireless, breathed a sigh of deep content. Triumphant love had wooed his heart away from thoughts of revenge; a languor wrapped itself about his soul—a delicious softness, born of the starbeams, which in no wise diminished his vigilance or lessened his firm control of the car.



They went on through the night.

WHAT A TEN-CENT BASKET WILL DO FOR CHRISTMAS

By Winnifred Fales

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

At the ten-cent store one day, I discovered some cunning little rattan baskets like miniature clothes-baskets, and with visions of the approaching Yuletide urging the necessity of "preparedness," I bought a dozen. The result is twelve really attractive Christmas gifts at the following modest cost:

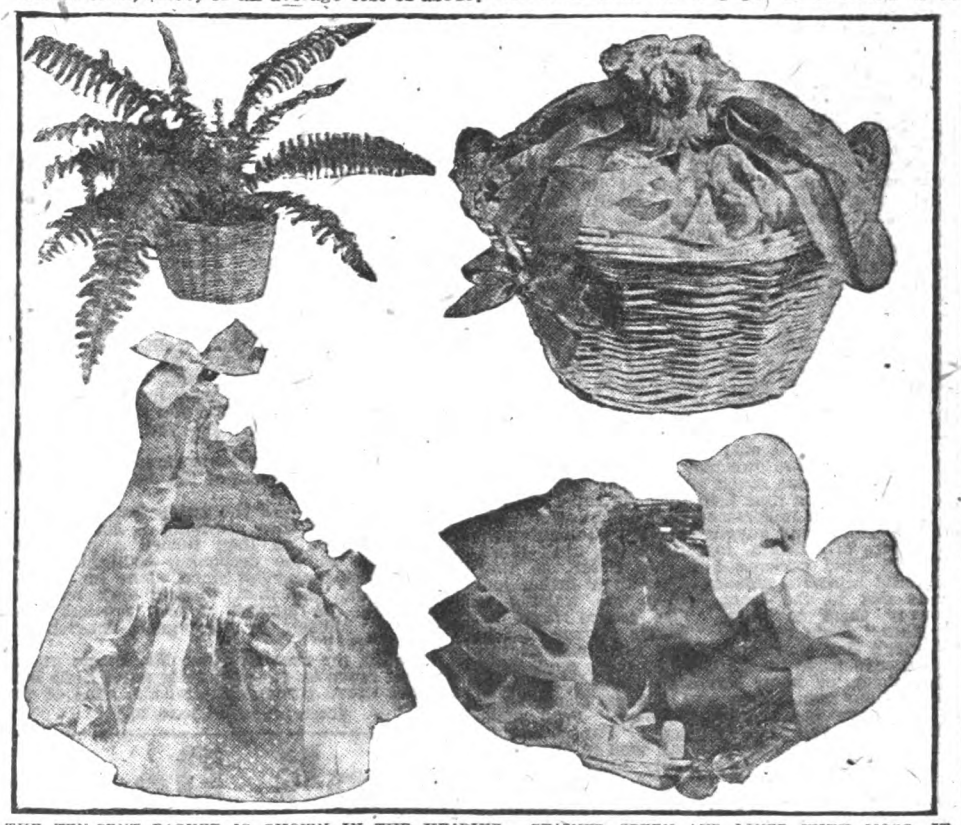
12	Baskets at ten cents each,	$1.20
1	Small can moss-green stain,	.10
1	Package gold bronze,	.25
3	Narcissus bulbs,	.15
2	Celluloid thimbles,	.10
2	Pairs small scissors,	2.00
1	Box kindergarten beads,	.10

Grand total, $2.90, or an average cost of about twenty-four cents each. All materials not listed were odds and ends and left-overs except, the candy, the cost of which I have not counted because it will be a small portion of a small batch not yet made! The baskets were prepared in the following manner:

Number one was stained green and lined with moss, and a small fern was planted in it.

Number two was similarly treated, suspended by scarlet cords, and planted with partridge berry vines.

Number three was gilded and used as a receptacle for an old bowl containing the three bulbs and pebbles in which to grow them.



Number four had fitted into it a pad of blue sateen tightly stuffed with wool. A counterpane, valance and canopy of Swiss muslin tied with blue ribbons transformed it into a tiny "bassinet" pincushion for a young mother.

Number five was made into a pink and white bassinet in which was snuggled a wee china baby to delight the heart of the Littlest Girl.

To numbers six and seven, bag tops of fancy cretonne were sewed and the baskets thus transformed into yarn holders to hang on the arm, the yarn being drawn out through the top. These are for two devoted knitters for the Red Cross.

Numbers eight, nine and ten were stained green and then an irregular border, three or four rows deep, of the big, bright-colored glass beads was sewed around just below the rim. They were lined with waxed paper in readiness to be filled with home-made candy. Similar baskets cost two dollars each in fashionable New York candy stores.

Numbers eleven and twelve were fitted up as sewing baskets for the fourteen-year-old twins. One was stained green, with scarlet fittings, and the other gilded and decorated with pale blue. Four little bags for buttons were made of ribbon and hung to the rim on one side, and a perky bow mounted on the other. A ribbon-covered needle roll and pin book, together with thimble and scissors, completed the outfit.

THE TEN-CENT BASKET IS SHOWN IN THE HEADING. STAINED GREEN AND LINED WITH MOSS, IT HOLDS A FERN. ADD A BAG TOP AND IT BECOMES A YARN HOLDER. NEXT IS SHOWN THE BASSINET PINCUSHION. LAST APPEARS THE SEWING BASKET.

The Best Cough Syrup Is Home-made

Here's an easy way to save $2, and yet have the best cough remedy you ever tried.

You've probably heard of this well-known plan of making cough syrup at home. But have you ever used it? When you do, you will understand why thousands of families, the world over, feel that they could hardly keep house without it. It's simple and cheap, but the way it takes hold of a cough will quickly earn it a permanent place in your home.

Into a pint bottle, pour 2½ ounces of Pinex; then add plain granulated sugar syrup to fill up the pint. Or, if desired, use clarified molasses, honey, or corn syrup, instead of sugar syrup. Either way, it tastes good, never spoils, and gives you a full pint of better cough remedy than you could buy ready-made for three times its cost.

It is really wonderful how quickly this home-made remedy conquers a cough—usually in 24 hours or less. It seems to penetrate through every air passage, loosens a dry, hoarse or tight cough, lifts the phlegm, heals the membranes, and gives almost immediate relief. Splendid for throat tickle, hoarseness, croup, bronchitis and bronchial asthma.

Pinex is a highly concentrated compound of genuine Norway pine extract, and has been used for generations for throat and chest ailments.

Avoid disappointment by asking your druggist for "2½ ounces of Pinex" with full directions, and don't accept anything else. Guaranteed to give absolute satisfaction or money promptly refunded. The Pinex Co., Ft. Wayne, Ind.

The Real Santa Claus

By Thomas W. Spain

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"Type of a Father who rules above,
Who all of our wants can see,
'Tis a ruthless hand that, e'en thro' love,
Would destroy this mystery.
Yes, sea blue eyes, so slumberous deep,
Which ask for an answer true,
The giver comes in clouds of sleep,
When earth slips away from you.
'Tis true, blue eyes, 'tis true."

"I TELL you, Sophie, there ain't no such animal in existence, never was, and never will be. I'm bringing up practical children for a practical world, where they've got to earn an honest living by honest methods, an' I ain't going to have their heads filled with lying yarns at the start. There aint no Santa Claus, young ones, you are to understand that at the go in. The truth is good enough for you folks, whatever anyone else thinks."

It was only Jim Burge making his usual ante-Christmas declaration in the little kitchen of their home as they were preparing to go to town one Christmas Eve for the usual holiday gifts.

They—in this case—were Jim, his wife, Sophie, and their two children, twins—a girl and a boy, Elsie and Fred.

Needless to say, Jim Burge had never believed in a Santa Claus; indeed, he treated the notion of the kindly old gentleman in knickerbockers and fur-topped boots with a tolerant contempt, declaring him to be a myth that only existed in the minds of credulous and over-sentimental mortals. He rather prided himself on his good, plain common sense, and he meant to bring his children up in the way in which they should go. He would not litter their young minds with a lot of false ideas about things that weren't rational and that had no foundation in fact.

"Good man as you are, Jim, in most ways, you would rob childhood of all its simplicity and trust." Mrs. Burge said somewhat reproachfully that morning, gathering the children close to her with a little knowing squeeze for each. "That's the fault I have to find with you, Jim, you never will believe anything that's not as plain as the nose on your face," continued Mrs. Burge, for though her husband was undisputed master of the house and generally had things his own way, yet Mrs. Burge had very decided views of her own in some matters and could not forego the satisfaction of voicing them at times, even though their only effect might be to confirm her husband in an opposite opinion. "And as for 'lying yarns,' as you call it, I'm sure I'm none the worse for receiving Old Santa's visits when I was a child. I shall always look back upon those days as the sweetest of my life. For my part, I never was much set against these harmless little myths that help to make folks happy."

The children understood her, as children never fail to understand anyone full of soul-imaginings.

"There is a Santa, just the same, ain't there, Elsie?" Fred whispered to his sister, as they lingered behind a moment after their father had gone out to the team, which was waiting to convey them to town. "Of course there is, brother," Elsie replied. "Didn't we see him in Fowler's dry goods store last year, and doesn't he always leave us extra gifts where papa can't find them, or know anything about them, and doesn't our mamma say so? I guess she knows."

"Yes, it's just as mamma says," Fred spoke more to himself than to Elsie. "Papa's worked in that old shop, among rough men in the smoke of the forge until he's partly blind. He can see only just what is in plain sight. Hidden things he cannot see any more."

Of the two children Fred was the more like his gentle mother, who, still almost at middle life, cherished and loved old Santa almost as much as she had in her early girlhood. All the friends of her own age had, of course, already ceased talking seriously about Santa; her husband did not know him, and did not even love him as one whom he had ever known but who had gone away from him; but Sophie's child-like mother heart kept old Santa unobliterated and painfully hidden away. The mother heart, after all, is old Santa's most beautiful and most unlosable home, even after that mother has grey hair; and the old fellow has millions of such homes scattered over the universe.

That year, as usual, Jim purchased a number of toys in his favorite shop and presented them to the twins, assuring the children that he had bought them, and that there was no Santa—not for him.

That year, as usual, the children hung their stockings in a little secret corner of the rambling old farmhouse, and great fun they had doing it—they and their sweet, gentle mother.

And that year, as usual, when Christmas morning dawned, they found that good old Santa had left many little gifts in passing over even that home where he was so much despised by the head of the house.

But the next year all was changed. The garden truck that Mr. Burge usually raised and sold in the village had been a complete failure owing to the drought; and people were very backward about coming forward to pay their bills in the little blacksmith shop. The family was in desperate circumstances, and it was a scrape and pinch with poor Mr. and Mrs. Burge to make both ends meet.

The twins, too, were growing older, approaching that stage in their lives where elf-land lay behind them and the shores of reality in front.

As Christmas approached, Mrs. Burge was terribly troubled and perplexed, seeing, as she did, no way in which the winter's supply of extra clothing was to be had, much less anything in the way of luxuries for the kids. Yet to Fred, who understood her sweet nature so perfectly, she never seemed so beautiful as she did through those anxious, trying hours.

"How different mamma's life must have been in her childhood," he said to Elsie, again and again. All the neighbors say she was a rich man's daughter before she married papa, and lived in a great house in Sweden, and now she's in want and sorrow. When I grow up and get big like Jake Rankin I'll——I'll——"

And then Elsie would cut him short with a little laugh, and dare him to race her to the blacksmith shop, where they would find their father tinkering at some odd job.

On Christmas Eve Mr. Burge went to the village as usual, and took the twins with him; but, what was rather unusual, Mrs. Burge refused to go. Her countenance these days showed little but a gentle melancholy, and was rarely lighted by the glimmer of a smile.

"It's no use Jim," she said aside to her husband as he was preparing to depart. "You must not, in the hearing of the children, ask me to go with you. I can't see so many Christmas things and not feel able to buy anything for them. But for heaven's sake, Jim, try to get them some little trinket; you know they will expect it."

Arrived in town that day, Mr. Burge took the twins, among other places, to the store of Toney Parillo. Toney was a genial fellow, full of the romantic friendliness of the well-bred Italian, and he had taken a great liking for the twins—to Elsie, so slender and light, with her heavy braids of golden hair, her merry blue eyes and mocking little stub nose; and to Fred, so wistful and full of strange, child-like questions.

"Well, Mr. Burge," said Toney, with a good-natured smile, while he fondled the kids affectionately, 'I suppose you came in to buy 'Santa Claus' for the children?"

"Santa Claus, nothing," answered Mr. Burge, rather curtly. "I can't get money enough this year to buy them shoes, to say nothing of Santa Claus. Eh, it's fine talking of Santa Claus when folks ain't got nothing to eat. Toney sympathized with Mr. Burge and remarked that it was a pity he couldn't play Santa to the kids as he would like. But by a little diplomacy he discovered just what the children and their sweet-faced mother would like that year for Christmas.

As they were ready to start home, Toney stepped with them to their team by the roadside in front of the little shop. As he fed Billie the horse a red apple, Fred, who was on excellent terms with Toney and was not sure that he would not rather have him for a papa than Mr. Burge, asked, "Toney, do you suppose Billie knows it's Christmas Eve?"

"Of course he does," answered Toney; "even the fishes on the bottom of the deepest seas know that."

As Mr. Burge and the twins drove off, Toney stood watching them, waving a last good by to the children as they turned a corner and disappeared in the deepening twilight. For a few minutes longer he stood alone on the edge of the walk, and then, tossing back his black, curly head, he laughed a low, musical laugh, saying to himself in very good English, "By Jinks, I will!"

Through the evening glow, Mr. Burge and the children drove on towards their quiet little home. As they drove through the woods, none of them

No More Wrinkles

BEAUTIFUL FIGURE
Superfluous Hair Vanishes Like Magic.
Eyelashes Beautified
Pimples and Blackheads Removed Forever

Let this woman send you free, everything she agrees, and beautify your face and form quickly.

This clever woman has not a wrinkle upon her face; she has perfected a marvelous, simple method which brought a wonderful change in her face. For removing wrinkles, her method is truly wonderfully rapid.

She made herself the woman she is today and brought about the wonderful change in her appearance in a pleasant manner. Her complexion is as clear and fair as that of a child. She had thin, scrawny eye-lashes and eyebrows, which could scarcely be seen, and she made them long, thick and beautiful by her own methods and removed every blackhead and pimple from her face.

Nothing is taken into the stomach, no common massage, no harmful plasters, no worthless creams.

By her new process, she removes wrinkles and develops the whole figure plump and fat.

It is simply astonishing the hundreds of women who write in regarding the wonderful results from this new beauty treatment, which is beautifying their face and form after beauty doctors and other methods failed. She has thousands of letters on file like the following.

Mrs. M. L. B. Albin, Miss., writes: "I have used your beauty treatment with wonderful success. I have not a wrinkle on my face now and it is also improving my complexion, which has always troubled me with pimples and blackheads. My weight was 112 pounds before taking your treatment and now I weigh 117, a gain of 5 pounds. Your treatment is a God send to all thin women. I am so grateful you may even use my letter if you wish."

The valuable new beauty book which Madame Clare is sending free to thousands of women is certainly a blessing to women.

All our readers should write her at once and she will tell you absolutely free; about her various new beauty treatments and will show our readers:

How to remove wrinkles in 6 hours;
How to make long, thick eyelashes and eyebrows;
How to remove superfluous hair;
How to remove blackheads, pimples and freckles;
How to remove dark circles under the eyes;
How to quickly remove double chin;
How to build up sunken cheeks and add flesh to the body;
How to darken gray hair and stop hair falling;
How to stop forever perspiration odor.

Simply address your letter to Helen. Clare, Suite A 203, 3311 Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill., and don't send any money, because particulars are free, as this charming woman is doing her utmost to benefit girls or women in need of information which will add to their beauty and make life sweeter and lovelier in every way.

Sugar 4½ cents per pound. See Big 4 announcement on page 19.

as seemed to bolster up his case. It is also the privilege of those who seek to make the pacifist look more idiotic, worm-like and contemptible than he actually is, to quote the Bible against him. That was my reason for quoting the Joshua sun incident. Theologians and scientists can thrash the matter out among themselves. The Bible should be read understandingly and lovingly. We are learning more and more about the universe we are living in every day of our lives and the more scientists reveal to us the more we are filled with a sense of awe and wonder, and I trust our hearts, too, are filled with a deeper reverence for the Divine Architect who created the marvels about us. If science and the Bible clash at times, don't let that turn you away from the grand old book for it is the only thing we have to anchor to, the one source of eternal truth and hope immortal. If the Kaiser and his warriors had delved deeper into those truths and applied them to their daily living, instead of creating a tribal god, the world would have been spared this war. The Kaiser talked too much of God, but both he and his people forgot about Christ, and this country, too, is forgetting Him as fast as it possibly can. God help us!

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs fifty-five cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The fifty-five cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C." a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

How to become a Member

Send fifty-five cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Decorating for Christmas

By Mary A. Roberts

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

Do not run out to the shop, purchase a few wreaths, hang them in the window and call the result "Christmas decorations." You might just as well frame a chromo and call it "Art." It is possible to put individuality, care and thought into your home decorations for the great holiday, without spending a great amount of money.

If you live in the country or near the country, plan an outing or two just before Christmas. Go into the woods and get evergreen. You are likely to find the long, trailing, velvety sort which makes such splendid wreaths. Even the sort that grows upright like tiny trees, may be pulled, done up in big bunches, and taken home to be wound with twine into long festoons which may be made for draping about the home or made into wreaths.

Cone-bearing pine branches are always beautiful and make especially fine decorations, but the branches of hemlock and any other greens should never be despised as they all help to brighten the home.

In decorating the hall, large branches of spruce are excellent; but pine or any other evergreen will serve nearly as well. Always choose full cone-bearing twigs; holly fastened among the branches of evergreen will be very effective.

An umbrella stand filled with tall branches of evergreens can be placed at the bottom of the stairway or on the first landing leading to floor above.

I have on several occasions used umbrella stands and waste-baskets for this purpose and found them very satisfactory. Red crepe paper or a bow of red ribbon will give a touch of Christmas color to the most ordinary waste-basket.

In many homes the top of the post at the head of the stairway is a good place for a small plain bowl filled with greens and holly. Branches of hemlock, fir, or arbor-vitæ are particularly suitable for this purpose.

In decorating pictures, the "overdone" effect must always be avoided. Small twigs of holly or evergreens placed here and there over the pictures are all that is necessary.

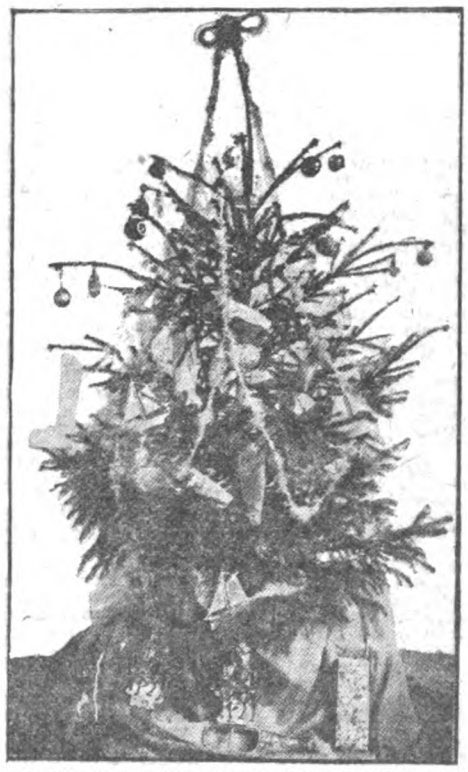
On the living-room table a small work-basket lined with red crepe paper or soft silk and filled with evergreens looks very well. If there is a lamp in the center it is always best to remove it, as the basket alone will be sufficient ornament.

All the candlesticks in the house should be brought out for the holidays and new, bright red candles placed in them. These are very inexpensive, one dozen costing but thirty cents.

In the dining-room a welcome change from the old familiar holly decorations can be made by tying branches of arbor-vitæ, the fir, cedar or hemlock with red or white frosted ribbon and putting them at each plate place.

For the center of the table a basket of fruit with small twigs of evergreens placed here and there will be very pretty.

Make the children's room a source of great pleasure to them during the holidays. Give them a small Christmas tree to be their own and allow them to decorate it as they will. From the current magazines they can cut out dolls to be hung on the tree, and a few inexpensive ornaments and small red apples will furnish the additional material.



This is a plan well worth trying for the sake of the young folk of the household and their little friends.

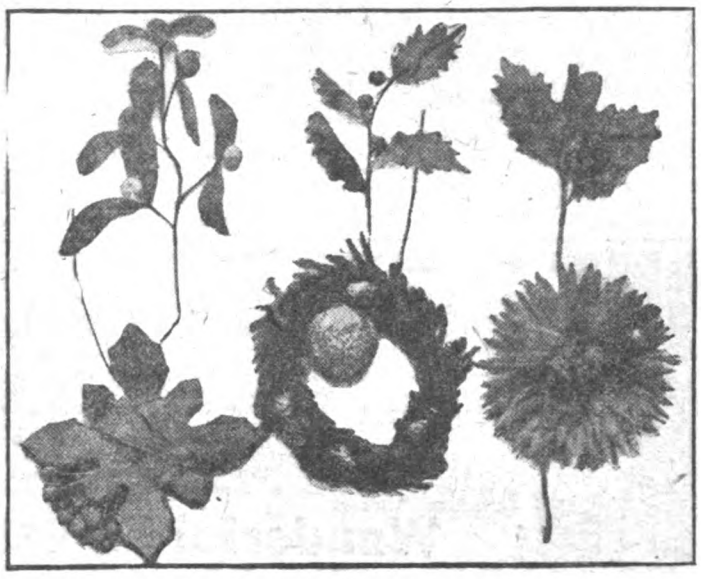
Stars and half-moons, some made of silver cardboard, others of red blotting-paper, can be suspended from doors and windows, and little angel babies with wings of tissue-paper hung from the ceiling will be an added delight to the children.

Several large figures of Santa Claus purchased for a few cents or cut out of periodicals can be pasted directly over the window panes, producing a most novel decoration. For the sake of variety a string of paper dolls holding hands can be used in the same way.

Each child should be allowed to wear a little bunch of evergreen tied with a bow of red ribbon, and any visitor to the house might be presented with small twigs of green ready to be pinned on. A work-basket filled with these little favors can be placed in the hall or living-room.

A pretty window decoration consists of branches of evergreens and holly tied together and suspended by fine wire. Or branches of evergreen alone tied with red ribbon can be used if preferred. If wreaths are used, plain holly or evergreen wreaths without bells or other ornaments are in good taste and really most effective.

GIVE THE CHILDREN A LITTLE TREE IN THEIR ROOM TO DECORATE IN THEIR OWN WAY.



Over the large open doorways branches of spruce or pine can be nailed up or suspended by wire. Full cone-bearing twigs must be selected for this purpose. This form of decoration is particularly suitable for large, spacious houses.

A few final bright touches can be added by placing red pillows on the couch and a red rug here and there. Red lamp-shades or anything else of that color that has been put away can be made use of again; and a small basket filled with greens and suspended from a chandelier or a hook in the ceiling makes a most charming decoration.

Last year, a young woman with very good taste, whom I know, came to live with her old-fashioned aunt. At Christmas time she begged to be allowed to do the decorating. She promised that she wouldn't spend a cent more than the usual sum for wreaths and she was sure her aunt would be pleased. This lady was sure she wouldn't be, but she was.

In the hall the girl put a fancy basket of loose holly, interspersed with a few small artificial poinsettias. In the living-room she trimmed the spaces over the windows and the door with boughs of Southern smilax. On the center table she placed a small, slender gray vase overhung with several stalks of those exquisite berries, called bitter sweet.

And in the dining-room she had a tiny Christmas tree, held upright in a hole made through an inverted chopping bowl, which was covered with the sparkling white powder that simulates snow. The branches of the tree admost touched the cloth and slender red candles were the only trimming. They were lit every evening for a little time, and twice, by the way, they caught fire. On the sideboard, she had two large baskets of fruit, imbedded in greens. The aunt admitted that the decorations were the most artistic and attractive she had ever seen.

FOR TABLE DECORATIONS OR FAVORS.

The finishing touch to Christmas decorations should always be to the table. A pretty Southern custom is to let the flowers for the table lie sprinkled on the cloth irregularly, and this is a charming way to use either holly, evergreens or partridge berries, which can also be pinned on the corners of the tablecloth where they hang down, or in the case of holly or evergreen branches four or five inches long, can be wired to the backs of the chairs.

For the middle of the table the prettiest thing possible is a Christmas tree. This may be either a tiny spruce or fir, or one of the fruited pepper-trees always for sale at Christmas. There should be a tiny candle for each one of the company, to be lighted at the very end of the dinner, while the coffee and the nuts and raisins are being served. Some small, nonsensical gift for each person may be hung on the tree and presented at the beginning of the dinner.

These table decorations seem to make the dinner have a deeper meaning than an ordinary dinner, as it should, while the nonsensical little gifts, something personal and a joke on each, if possible, bring joy and laughter, the two greatest digestive aids in the world.

The Brigand that Followed the King

See front cover illustration.

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

By David Wallace

IT was the peaceful starlit Bethlehem Hills on that first of all the glorious nights before Christmas. The shepherds who had assembled at Migdal-Eder for common protection against marauding brigands were hurrying away toward the little city of David with hearts athrill with strange emotions and high expectations. Back of a clump of wild mustard above the watchtower, a dark form stirred, and Eleazar, "Wolf of the Judean Hills," staggered to his feet. Peering over the hilltop about an hour before reconnoitering his prey, the wily desperado was arrested by the voice of a venerable shepherd addressing the company on some absorbing theme. Crawling like a snake to the shelter of the great bushes, Eleazar had listened spellbound to the shepherd-seer as he pointed out a strange luminary in the heavens and recited Balaam's sublime Messianic prophecy. When the skies were suddenly cleft asunder and the blinding glory and heavenly music burst forth upon the hill, he fell on his face like one dead and lay still and cold until he could hear human voices again and when he looked up he saw the shepherds hastening down the hill. As he rubbed his eyes and stumbled against the edge of the miniature jungle he seemed as one suddenly awakened from a dream, a dream not of the night but of the years, not of fortune or fantasy but of glorious fate, and he grasped desperately at every clue that clung to burning memory. He recalled the wild wandering tent life on the edge of the great desert, his father playing the dual role of trader and brigand, and his mother, a quiet, patient, tender-hearted woman, the rose bloom on her upper cheeks and the steady lovelight in her coal black eyes. What was that story she used to tell him over and over again when a little boy, as they sat by the tent at the cool of the evening and watched the great stars as they came down, down, down, until they seemed to be resting just about the tent door? Oh, it was a vague, misty, jumbled memory, for he had the wild spirit of the desert and was soon old enough to mount his fleet-footed Arab and ride away to join his father in his thrilling exploits. But there was something in it about a King, a mighty Prince of Israel who would be greater than Moses or David or Solomon and who would gather together again the scattered and oppressed race of his fathers and lead them to triumph and glory! Oh, it all seemed but the wildest dream and never before since the innocent days at his mother's knee had he felt the thrill of its romance or dreamt of the possibility of its realization. One day his father had gone forth from his tent never to return, his surviving clansmen reporting that he had fallen in a fight with a Roman patrol across the Judean border, and from that day to this, Eleazar had been a red-handed Isthmaelite whose hand was against every man, and both Herod and Cæsar had placed a high price on his head.

This was Eleazar, "Wolf of the Judean Hills," as the impatient band of brigands hiding in the woods back of the hilltop knew him.

Eager for quick and decisive action and nervous and fretful because of his protracted absence, the brigands deserted their ambush and crept stealthily to the edge of the hill. Finding the shepherds gone and their chief alone, they rushed to his side, praising his wonderful prowess and eager to fly upon the spoil. But there was something in the chief's eyes and manner that startled them and they glanced around with apprehension, fearing some sinister strategy on the part of the decamping shepherds.

"It is in the wrong direction you look, brothers," he said, his voice as startling as his manner, and as they paused to listen he lifted his hand and solemnly pointed to heaven—

"It is not the fear of man that is in Eleazar's heart," he explained, "it is the fear of——"

His mother had taught him that it was awful sacrilege even to name the name of Jehovah their God, and the warning came back like a blow in the face.

Dumbfounded by his wild talk and creepy manner, the men looked at each other with painful enquiry and confusion and Kir the lieutenant ventured a suggestion.

The stars lose their twinkle, Master. What we do we must do quickly. Which flock shall we seize and in what direction shall we drive?"

"The man who touches a hair of one of these sheep is a dead dog," Eleazar answered as they glared at him with astonishment and resentment. "While you were hiding yonder, brothers," he proceeded, "strange things were happening here. From the hilltop I heard the shepherds talking about some wonderful star, and crawling down under the shadow of the mustard, I found a holy man pointing out the star and reciting a thrilling prophecy about the Star of Jacob which was to be the sign of the birth of a great King. And as they all gazed at the star and marvelled at the prophecy, the heavens suddenly opened and a blinding light burst upon the hill. I was stricken with terror and dread and cannot tell just what happened but I could almost imagine I heard a voice from heaven and a great choir of angels singing such music as mortals never heard before. And the most wonderful effect of all, brothers, is that the shock has revived within me memories and emotions of stories my mother used to tell me as a boy in the tent on the edge of the desert."

Again the alarmed brigands cast furtive glances at each other, slyly tapping the sides of their heads and nodded to Kir to answer again and make his appeal more urgent and emphatic.

"Eleazar can think deeply and long about such things while enjoying the spoils by the wells of Beersheba," he pleaded. "The shepherds must have heard the low growl of 'The Wolf,' and go to fetch Herod's dogs. We must fly upon the spoil and away or Herod's hunters will fly upon and make spoil of us."

"Oh, Kir, you cannot understand and I know not how to make you," Eleazar answered with a touch of tender feeling. "Judas will bring my steed and you can all choose whether to follow me or go your own ways. I am going to join the shepherds in following the star and searching for the King. Something tells me that this is the way of my destiny."

"Go not, Master; it is the way of death," cried Kir, seizing him by the cloak and giving way to passionate emotion.

"While you are searching for this phantom King, a real and terrible King is searching for you and the price on Eleazar's head is high and tempting. Let Judas trail the shepherds and bring you back the report."

"Ah, Kir," he gently replied, pushing him away "I wish we might see eye to eye, but you cannot comprehend, you cannot believe. They who follow the star never come back, they cannot come back. I have heard the call and must answer it and I fear not what awaits me for my King is greater than legions of Herods and Cæsars."

"I have brought mine, too, Master," cried Judas, appearing with the horses, the flush of a great emotion lighting up his handsome young face. "I go with you, Master, anywhere you lead."

Amazed and awestricken, the low-browed ruffians slunk away from the face of the transfigured leader and gathered around the lieutenant. As Eleazar mounted his horse, Kir shook his head sadly and looked with painful anxiety toward Bethlehem.

"You go the way of death, Master," he said, "but you go following a light. If we go we stumble in the dark and die as the fool dieth. Peace be with you, Master, and remember that the "lair of The Wolf" is still thy stronghold, and that we are still thy slaves."

With affectionate farewells they parted and the two men rode off quietly down into the valley, giving the reins to their princely Arabs, who seemed to sense an unusual situation with almost human sagacity and concern.

"Let me go forward, Master, and be your eyes and ears," proposed Judas, as they reached the foot of the hill and struck the beaten track to Bethlehem. "My face is still my own and I can play the fox with skill."

"Ah, Judas, you are a brave soul, but you cannot understand," he answered. "I do not comprehend myself clearly. A great change has taken place in me. I am no longer an outlaw but the subject of a new King, the greatest of all the Kings that ever reigned on earth. My mother used to tell me about it in the tent on the edge of the desert. Herod and Cæsar can no longer harm me, they can but hasten my immortality."

The strange light in his eyes burned with a more wonderful brilliance as he spoke and the boy's breath came hot and fast as he leaned forward in his saddle to catch every word.

"I cannot understand but I can believe, Master," he cried with passionate earnestness. "I, also, am a son of Israel."

When they reached the market-place of Bethlehem, the mystic foregleams of an oriental dawn illumined the far horizon and the thrifty traders had already begun to stir about and open up their stalls. Far down the open highway the vague outlines of the old caravansary loomed up, and moving specters of laden camels, turbaned attendants and mounted merchants could be seen pouring out of the open gate. As they continued their progress a group of excited shepherds appeared, singing and shouting as if celebrating some joyous event. The confused echoes of their exclamations startled and thrilled Eleazar as he hastened toward them.

"The star! The angel! The Magi! The King!" These were the refrains of their songs and the burden of their story and they were accosting every passer and telling some thrilling story and urging everybody to go into the inn and see for himself the wonderful babe and the princely Magi who had come from the far East with their precious gifts.

"Abide here till I return," whispered his Master to Judas as he hastened away through the gateway of the inn to the strangest of all places for the nativity of a King. Long and earnestly he gazed at the little baby, reverently stooping to kiss the tender forehead and laying a purse of gold at his feet, and then bowing low before the venerable Magi he begged the privilege of escorting them to the hilltop above Hebron, the first stopping place on their return journey. Eager to instruct him and inspire him with their own enthusiasm, the Magi talked to him all the way, of stars, of dreams, of revelations, of prophecies, everything pointing to the coming of the King.

Breathlessly he looked and listened as each took up his story, the wonderful light in his eyes burning deeper and stronger, lifting his hand at times to ask a question or make some striking comment; but, by and by, they noted with painful alarm that he grew silent and sad and seemed to be lost in strange perplexity.

"You wonder why my heart grows sad and heavy," he said as they halted on the hilltop above Hebron to say their farewells. "I am thinking, oh, Magi, what a poor, weak, little thing a babe is to contend against Herod and Cæsar."

"Ah, but you forget, my son," answered Melchior, the most venerable, "that it is Jehovah who is the strength and hope of this wonderful child. Jehovah, the Everlasting, the Almighty, the King of all the Gods. What is his word, Eleazar? Is it not this? Unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given! and the government shall be upon his shoulders and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and of peace there shall be no end upon the throne of David and upon his Kingdom to establish it, and to uphold it with righteousness from henceforth even forever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this."

A gray mist rose over the young man's eyes as he lovingly stroked his Arab's glossy neck and listened, and as the venerable prophet lifted his hands in benediction, he answered: "What to you is the light of the sun at noonday, oh, Melchior, is to me but the flickering of the fireflies in the valley. You have long years of wisdom and experience, I have only dreams and hopes. But I can wait and watch for the day of the King, and, oh, how gladly will I give him my love, my sword, my life."

Back over the dusty highway rode Eleazar with Judas his faithful escort by his side, his mind confused and wandering, his heart overwhelmed with strange emotions, the little flickering light within growing dimmer and dimmer as he went along.

Passing the last incoming caravan, the riders gave the Arabs free rein and flying with the wind were back about sundown at the immortal well of "Bethlehem by the gate." Riding through the town but avoiding all parley they soon emerged on the main thoroughfare to Jerusalem. At a fast clip they could reach the great city before the gates would be closed and among the crowds waiting for Roman registration find shelter and safety and then wait for the light.

About midway between Bethlehem and Jerusalem there is a lonely valley through which the Kedron passes on its way to the Dead Sea with dark winding hills on either side. Cautious travelers always picked their steps stealthily through this region for enterprising brigands had been quick to recognize its advantages for their business. Quietly and warily the two men made their way down the winding hill overshadowed by palms and sycamores, across the brook and up the winding hill on the other side. Suddenly they halted as they reached the top, for there, coming swiftly toward them, were three horsemen, glistening in armor and richly caparisoned and bearing the ensigns that they feared as the fear of death. "Golden armor and iron feet," sang Judas as he wheeled around; "they have the eagles on their horses' heads but we have them on our horses' heels. Up and away, Master! We can be over the hills before they reach Bethlehem's gates."

But to the horror of Judas, instead of wheeling around and taking the lead, Eleazar stopped deliberately and lifted his hand to his head.

"They are upon us, Master," cried Judas in mad desperation as he stood in his stirrups and seized Eleazar's cloak. "We are no match for them, we must fly, fly!"

But instead of turning, Eleazar broke away and seizing his spear, dug the spurs deep into his Arab's sides. A great thought had burst upon him, dispelling all his confusion and perplexity and opening up a way before him like the way of the sinking sun on the open waters. "What if these horsemen were Herod's bloodhounds sent out to track down the wise men from the East and compel them to return to Jerusalem, bringing the young King of the Jews with them?" It might have been something the wise men told him as they started for their home by another way that suggested the thought, it might have been an inspiration from God, but instantly the way before him was the way of supreme duty, the way of manifest destiny, the way of glorious fate, and Eleazar's heart sang for joy as he lifted his spear and sprang forward.

Like a flying god he seemed as he thundered across the plain, shouting the battle cry of his clan and "The King!" "The King!" as he prepared to strike.

Two of the horsemen went down before his fearful onslaught but the third got in a mortal thrust before Judas came to the rescue and wreaked a speedy and terrible revenge. "I can see the star clear and steady now, Judas, and I know the King is coming to his own," he whispered as the heartbroken youth knelt at his side and tried to stanch the flowing wound.

"Don't weep for me, Judas," he pleaded. "It it not my life I'm regretting; it is that I cannot see him in all his glory and power."

Gasping, choking, he rolled over in a dead faint and then as the boy held his head up and poured wine into his lips, the light broke for a moment through the death mist and the hoarse whisper burst into notes of triumph.

"Oh, Judas! Judas! If you live to see him crowned and mighty, and triumphant, tell him that I gave my heart to him; tell him that I died fighting for him; tell him that perhaps I saved——"

Poor Eleazar! first Knight of the cross, child of passion and plaything of fate but with eyes that can see a great light and a heart that scorns any sacrifice but the uttermost—who knows but thou didst save the life of the King?

PART II.

"BACK to Centralia. I was coming for you in the car, but something got wrong at the Cheniere Bridge. The engine stopped and I couldn't start it again; so I walked from there."

This time the oath slipped out in spite of me. The idea of that proud girl walking alone through the mud and darkness was too much for me.

"Wait!" I commanded. "You must drink a cordial before you go out again in those wet clothes! I'll make up the time lost—lucky I've got my chains on!"

We hurtled through the rain and darkness over the sixteen miles of slippery roads to Centralia, and in the noise and confusion she told me as best she could what Roy had done. It was to me a plain case of misusing his power of attorney and appropriating trust funds for private use. For the rest, the envy of less successful lawyers was enough to put a sleuth hound on his trail. The amount, to my rural mind, was staggering—seven thousand dollars. I made a hasty estimate of all my own earthly wealth.

"We'll pay it back and stop the investigation," I encouraged.

The poor girl groaned.

"I have begged him! begged him!" she sobbed, "not to buy me so many costly gifts. Dr. Elgin, I am as guilty as he is! He spent most of that money on me!"

"But of course you thought he was making all his money honestly."

"He told me he was. He would come to me and say: 'I made so and so on such and such a case.' I even kept a little account book and set down the various amounts he said he made and the sums we paid out; but I am no bookkeeper,—I lost track and he did, too. Dr. Elgin, I firmly believe he aimed to pay that money back!"

I swore to myself as I pictured that poor girl keeping her imaginary accounts. "Once a gambler, always a gambler;" the saying ran through my mind. I cursed myself for letting him have that first fifty dollars. I had simply made a big gambler out of a little one and in doing so had broken this girl's heart.

It was two o'clock in the morning when we reached Centralia,—too late to do anything that stormy night. Even the telegraph office was closed. I did, however, get Roy's father on the rural phone and asked him to be in Centralia at daybreak. Then Theo and I went to her apartments and made a crude inventory of all she possessed.

I am no judge of the value of jewelry and neither was Theo; but she laid out each separate piece,—the bracelet, a costly Tiffany engagement ring, bought after the wedding, a pearl levalier, a gold and platinum wedding ring, a platinum inlaid wrist watch, brooches, pins, and ornaments galore. The phonograph, she explained, had been bought on the installment plan and was only half paid for, and so it was for the most part with the rest of the furniture. The piano would bring perhaps three hundred dollars at a forced sale. The car was clear and might bring fifteen hundred. We estimated that we had thirty-five hundred dollars in sight.

"I have a thousand dollars' worth of salable clothes," ventured the girl.

"But you shall not sell your clothing!"

"I will sell everything!"

She brought out an armful of dresses and began sorting them and making an inventory of them. She was now dry eyed. She looked proudly straight ahead; and, looking on, I could not but realize what she was suffering. I knew that the impression of this night's work would be last to leave her heart and brain when she died. I think if Roy Hodge had come in at that moment I could have cheerfully wrung his neck for him.

"I will sell everything!" she kept repeating; and I knew that she meant to pay the debt from her own labor if Roy did not return and pay it.

"If I had found a wonder girl like this in my youth," I mused; "what a man I might have been."

But I did not aim to let her sell her clothes. I am a poor man, but I stood ready then to sell or mortgage my little all if it would save the boy's good name and the girl's happiness.

Our plan was to get in touch with Roy and get him to come back home and face the people he had wronged. For the next two or three days we kept the wires busy but got no word from him. Then on the third morning Theo got a telegram from Hoboken.

SAILING FOR EUROPE ON CATTLE BOAT. AM HEART BROKEN.

His father and I called on his chief creditors It was the funds of the succession of one Harriette Ward that he had peculated, and the chief prosecutor was an old skinflint, Harriette Ward's brother. The fact now developed that most of Roy's money had not been spent directly but gambled away on cotton futures. There was little sympathy for him in Centralia and none at all among the legal profession.

The skinflint, Ward, denied poor Theo even the poor satisfaction of making a self-sacrifice by coming at once and seizing everything in sight. You may picture the scene when at the door of the courthouse when little intimate presents, frocks that carried in their folds the ghostly memories of delightful evenings, and even bits of delicate underwear were exposed for sale. There was a profanation about it all that left me sick at heart.

I bought in a number of little things to which I knew the girl attached a sentimental value, though I doubted if she would ever accept them from me. She of course did not come near the sale. She had shut herself up in her room and refused to see even her most intimate friends. Her Byrrell pride was touched. She had spoken very little to me except in way of business, but I could see that she regarded the affair as a worse tragedy than death. I think she actually tried to starve herself. Her mother came to see her, but for twelve hours she would not admit her, but talked with her through the door; until her mother finally touched her to tears and gained admission.

Almost before we knew it they had brought Roy back for trial. I went to the jail and offered to make bond for him, but he was so shamefaced that he said he did not wish to be outside where people could see him and point at him. He asked me to arrange for a meeting between him and Theo, and this I did.

I never want to witness such another meeting. He simply held her in his arms and wept. He begged her to forgive him, and when she told him she had forgiven him, he could not believe it and still wept on. Roy was a weak man; that was his trouble, a brilliant mind and a weak will. He had committed this crime for the sake of his wife. He told me he was buying cotton futures on what would have been a cinch if the war had not suddenly broken out and killed the market. He wanted to make a hundred thousand dollars—that was what he said, "a hundred thousand dollars," in order to take Theo to the city and take her into the kind of society that he foolishly believed she longed for. You see, the girl had made him all that he was, and he felt that he owed her a glorious repayal.

Of course none of these arguments would have had any weight with a jury, and they were not offered. Roy was given three years in the State penitentiary.

On the day he was sent away Theo went to live in the country with his father and mother. She could not take music pupils there, because they lived three miles from Pecan and had no piano. She might have got her old place back in the Pecan school, but she was unable to face people. At the Hodges' she became a recluse and was not at home to any visitor. She earned her keep by milking the cows, looking after the chickens, and doing often the heaviest kind of household drudgery. Her mother in Mississippi sent her money every month, and with this she used to send books, comforts, and presents of every kind to her husband. The rural carrier never stopped at the Hodge box that there was not a fresh letter in it for the penitentiary address. The Hodges came to love this girl as if she were their own flesh and blood, and no wonder; she was the very angel of that stricken home.

One day about fifteen months after Hodge had been sent away Theo came to me with a hundred dollars, the pitiful savings of all her days of drudgery with the boy's parents.

"Please buy Roy a good suit of clothes and everything necessary and if there is money left please place it in the pocket of his trousers and send it to him," she begged. "He is—— is coming home next week."

I looked into the girl's eyes for a gleam of happiness, but none was there. She had changed, had aged in the months that had passed since that November night. She was no longer a creature of song and sunshine, but a woman of dark moods and with a will of iron. I told her now of that other time when, inspired by her singing, the boy had come to me and I had put up for him a new suit and accessories to give him a start in life.

"And he paid you the fifty dollars back, didn't he?" she asked very eagerly like one looking for a jewel in a rubbish heap.

"Yes, he paid it all back," I said; but I saw her face darken anew as she read the lie in my voice.

One week from that afternoon Theo came to my house alone in the dead of night.

state, 95,000 children between the ages of six and eight years receive instructions. There are 115,000 school children in Utah but several thousands of these attend private schools. They are taught in 700 school buildings, valued at $8,000,000. The expenditure for school purposes has now reached the sum of $4,000,000 per annum, which means an expenditure of $35.00 for each pupil of school age or an annual tax of $11.00 to each person in the state.

I must not tire you this time or you will not let me come again.

MRS. A. L. MORRILL.

SAND SPRINGS, OKLA.

FOR COMFORT SISTERS:

I like COMFORT very much. Reading the September number I felt as if I would like to talk to some of the sisters. I would say to "A Worried Mother," "Don't worry too much about your boy." The playful, full-of-life boy is the one who usually succeeds; he is energetic, only needing the energy to be applied in the right direction. Let him play, but mix play with work, doing the little needed work or lessons first. My boy is the same "full-of-play" boy, too, but I say, "Lessons first," and how he will work in order to get to play. Don't scold or discourage; make the boy feel that he has accomplished something each day, or will be able to master some undertaking.

Parkville School, in Missouri, or Chillicothe, Mo., are good. One can work their way through these schools, that is, they can pay for their board and tuition after they get employment (and the school will find the employment for you). The environments of these schools are good.

I suppose there are other schools similar to these mentioned but I know these two to be good. Write to Box 255, Sand Springs, Okla., for information concerning schools.

As for "Wife in Name Only," I think your husband is a gentleman. He cannot help his feelings toward the nurse but since he has controlled his actions what more could you ask? This alone shows he wishes to be what he has proved himself to be. I think, by your being good, jovial as you can, the good wife and mother, always doing your duty, your husband's passing fancy for the nurse will fade and some day—not far o-f-f in the future—he will find that you are the one who holds, and is entitled to his best love and honor as you have helped him to retain the family honor; this alone is worth much.

Mrs. Ernest Wheeler, I know a woman who selected her children from a home. She taught the children that God giveth life to all living things. How the beautiful flowers are wrapped in the tiny seed, only requiring to be planted in the rich soil, with moisture, light and the proper care to cause the plant to first burst through the soil, then, by and by, the beautiful blossom unfolds.

COMFORT'S Christmas Medley of Original

Christmas Courtesy

COURTESY in giving means care in selecting. The value of Christmas or any gift lies in its appropriateness. Never think any little thing will do when you feel reasonably sure it will not give pleasure or be of any use to the recipient, and a standard rule of Christmas giving should always be not to give more than one really can afford.

Whatever we have in abundance tends to make us consider it of less value and at times we are apt to forget how much another might appreciate it. For this reason much which could be done in the way of real giving is often overlooked.

For example, a country woman with little money to spare, but wishing to remember a city friend, would scarcely consider a bag of potatoes.

But even so humble a gift could be made attractive and would be valued if sent to the right person.

In preparing, use a clean potato sack and then put this into a bag fashioned of holly paper. Make this exactly like the regular paper bags with a folded bottom, tie up with red and green twine and attach a card bearing the following:

"Fry me, bake me, stew me, boil me;
'Tis most impossible to spoil me.
Bells are pealed on Christmas gay
But we are peeled three times a day.
We'd open our eyes in great surprise
To find a man who'd us despise.
Boil me, stew me, bake me, fry me;
If you don't believe I'm good
Just try me."

Other farm produce can also be easily sent by parcel post, such as apples, eggs, homemade jellies, jams and pickles, any of which will be sure of a welcome by city folks, especially those modern cliff dwellers as they are sometimes humorously referred to, who occupy tiny apartments, having no space for more than a day's supplies.

As always it is the thought represented by any gift which gives it a value not to be estimated in dollars and cents. So put on your thinking cap, utilize whatever you happen to have and you will be surprised at what you can accomplish with a little-work and odd lots of ribbon, lace and linen. Send each gift out with a little note or jingle, and remember to mail early.

"This little humble gift means more
Than if it were purchased at a store,
For it was made in Christmas spirit true,
While thinking kindly thoughts of you."

Or this:

"With heart and hand I fashioned it,
This little gift for you;
Each thread a thought of your happiness,
Each stitch a wish to come true."

This message will add to the gift:

"I was thinking kind thoughts of you dear every day
As each little stitch in this work I was taking,
And I hope that the pleasure it gives to you may Be as great as the pleasure I found in the making."

Canvas Collar Bag

This bag has a crocheted bottom stretched over a silk bag having a stiff cardboard bottom, while the top of the bag is rather coarse cream linen decorated with cross-stitch medallions.

For these one could use any of the small flowers which are used on the towels, surrounding the design with a border of cross-stitches as shown. In this instance, these stitches are of a golden brown to match the silk lining of the bag.

CANVAS COLLAR BAG.

Crocheted Bottom

Using No. 15 mercerized cotton, ch 6, join in ring, ch 3, 7 d c in ring, join to ch 3.

2nd round.—Ch 3, 1 d c on 1st d c, 2 d c on each d c, join.

3rd round.—Ch 3, 1 d c on 1st d c, 1 d c on each d c, with ch 1 between double, join.

4th round.—Ch 3, 1 d c, 2 d c on each d c, repeat around and join.

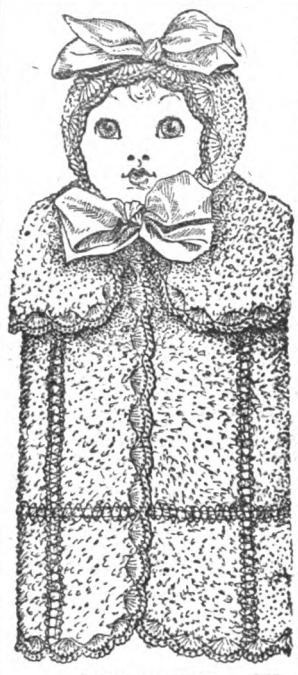
5th round.—Ch 3, 1 d c, ch 1, 2 d c, ch 1, 2 d c, repeat around and join.

Now to increase sufficiently to keep work flat, make ch 2, between each group of 2 doubles as soon as necessary. When work is as large as one wishes the size of the bottom to be, further increasing is not necessary. Make six more rows and break thread.

Top Finish

Edge top of the bag with one row single crochet worked into the linen, join, ch 5, 1 tr in next st, ch 1, sk 1, 1 tr c in next st, repeat around, join, ch 5.

2nd round.—1 tr c under ch 1, ch 1, 1 tr c under next ch, repeat around, join.



3rd round.—1 s c in 3 sts, ch 3 for picot, 3 s c, repeat.

Use either cord or ribbon for drawing up.

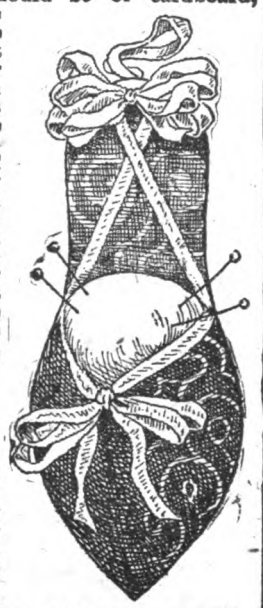
Bags for gifts are always popular, laundry bags, work bags, handkerchief bags, button, string and broom bags, any sort of a bag which you know is lacking.

A Soap Baby

These little home-made dollies are very cute and little folks immediately make love to them.

A SOAP BABY.

Our illustration gives one but a faint idea of how sweet this little bath dolly is. The little face is painted on a round cake of soap, and then wrapped in a wash-cloth.



To do this place the soap near the edge on the center of one side of the cloth, carry the edge down and fasten under dolly's chin. Fold the corners on this same side diagonally and catch under the chin. This will bring the two corners on the opposite side together as shown.

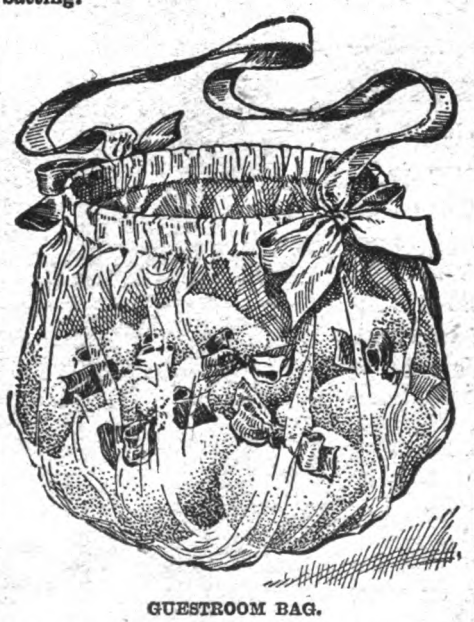
The little fullness in the back is folded in at the bottom of the soap and sewed in place. Finish with tiny bows of wash ribbon in any desired color.

Slipper Pincushion

Our illustration gives one a fairly clear idea of how such a little cushion will appear if made up neatly of contrasting colors.

The foundation should be of cardboard, shaped somewhat like a slipper sole. The toe piece should flare out and be enough wider to form the pocket on the front which is filled in with the small cushion.

SLIPPER PINCUSHION.



This little trifle if made up of pretty materials finished with ribbons and bows and filled with pins will make an acceptable little gift, for pins are a constant necessity and are one of the few things which never go out of style.

A Pair of Pincushions

A pair of pincushions, to hang each side of her dresser, will be appreciated by the girl at school—or at home, for that matter—because there is no "maiden fair" who does not delight in dainty things for her room. The pincushions are of white linen, triangular in shape, and with a simple design in solid embroidery, which should match the prevailing color of the room in which they are to be used. Make bows of narrow ribbon of the same shade. A single cushion makes a pretty gift, but the set is, of course, more unique.

Guestroom Bag

For this dainty little article which will surely be appreciated by any travel-worn visitor, one only needs a square of white wash net, a six-inch wooden hoop, one yard of inch and a half ribbon, a little baby ribbon, and some cotton batting.

GUESTROOM BAG.

Cut the net into a circle, gather up edge and sew over rings. Finish with ribbon for hanging. Then fill with little individual puff balls of cotton.

These are made by forming the cotton into balls, tying closely with strong thread, and then clipping the cotton off quite closely.

Finish each ball with a small bow of baby ribbon.

For Powdering One's Back

A slipper sole or even pasteboard shaped like a sole will answer for the foundation of this little article, which is another suggestion for some sort of home-made gift with a use.

If one uses a sole with one side of cotton or wool one half of it need not be covered, otherwise a small piece of eider down can be used, while the balance of the other half which serves as a handle should be slightly padded and covered with silk.

FOR POWDERING ONE'S BACK.

Cover the back smoothly with silk, ribbon or velvet and finish off the edges with a small silk cord, while the division on the front can be marked with a band of narrow ribbon tied and then caught in place.

Net Bag for Lingerie Ribbons

This inexpensive little article is very dainty and attractive as well as being most useful.

For making one will need one and one-third yards of white wash net: fold this exactly in half and cut into circles. Turn in two inches on the edge of each circle and run around with a double strand of rope silk.

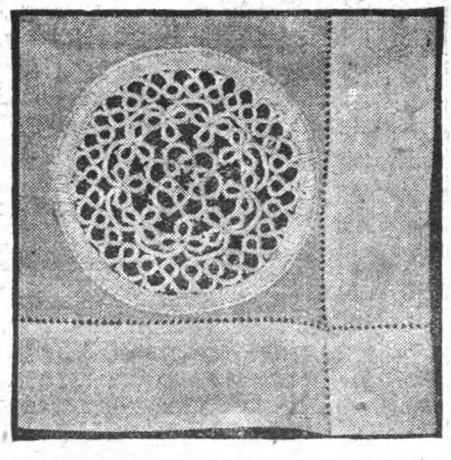
Place the two circles together, fold and mark the center, from this point draw a circle six inches in diameter, run around this with embroidery silk.

Divide the bag from this point circle out to edge into four equal parts and run along these divisions with double embroidery silk. This forms four pockets each of which can be fitted with a bolt of lingerie ribbon.

Washable Doll

The wash-cloth doll is a clever little affair, and is easily made. The body and head is all one roll of cotton, arms and legs each separate rolls, joined to the body and afterwards covered with wash-cloth clothes. About a half of one cloth will be needed for dolly's coat, the balance cut so the border will form the edge is used for the cap, arms and legs, while bits from the center can be used for the face and to put over the ends of the arms and legs.



WASH-CLOTH DOLL.

Small pearl buttons sewed on with black are used for the eyes, while a stitch or two of black marks the nose and mouth.

Tatted Medallion

BY MRS. JOHN D. PERRY.

Our illustration shows a handsome tatted medallion made of very fine cotton, suitable for decorating a handkerchief. This same design, however, worked in coarser material could be for inserts in bags, scarfs, pillows or in fact anything which one wishes to decorate with tatting. Center is of 6 rings each of 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s with ch between of 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p. 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, surround with 3 ring clover design each of 6 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 6 d s, joining the center p of the center ring to the center p, of each ch, the clover designs being connected with ch of 6 d s, 1 p, 6 d s, 1 p, 6 d s, 1 p, 6 d s, the rings in the outer row are each of 5 d s, 1 p, 5 d s, 1 p, 5 d s, 1 p, 5 d s, joining each as made to one of the picots of chs in last row, these rings are connected by chs of 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d. s.

Pin Balls

Cut six two and one-quarter-inch circles, cover one side of each smoothly and overcast two and two together closely.

Crochet over ten small brass rings, filling in the centers with spider webs, as shown. Use these to connect and for hanging. Fill the circles with pins and finish with a small bow.

A Dainty Pin Tray

An attractive little tray for one's bureau or dressing-case can actually be made in a few minutes. All one needs is a pair of wooden embroidery hoops, some two and a half yards of half-inch satin ribbon, four glass push tacks and a small piece of flowered ribbon or silk.

PIN BALLS.

Cover each of the hoops by winding evenly with the ribbon. Then across the small hoop stretch a piece of silk tightly and sew the edge all around securely to the outside of the hoop. Next slip the outside hoop on, pressing it in place from the bottom up. This will carry the raw edges of the silk which forms the bottom up and out of sight.

The small glass tacks are used as feet and tend to make this little article more effective, although they are not absolutely necessary.

If one wishes to make these little articles still more attractive one good-sized rosette of baby ribbon or two smaller ones, on opposite sides of the tray, may be added. A combination of colors is also sometimes used, one hue being wound on the inner ring, and another on the outer.

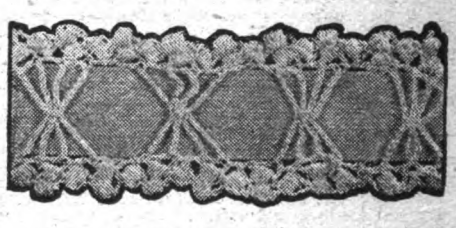
In selecting hoops for these trays, pairs which do not fit closely are best, otherwise the rings should be sandpapered before covering or one will have difficulty in placing them together.

Twine Case

In parts of the country where gourds can be obtained readily, our sketch shows how one can be carved in an amusing way and made to serve as a holder for a ball of twine.

TWINE CASE.

The top should be cut at a point large enough to admit the ball, and a large nail can be used to make the hole, through which the twine can be slipped between the lips.



The carving should be done while the gourd is green. Colors may be added or decorations burned in with a hot poker point.

Crocheted Garters

Ch 14 sts, ch 5 sts and join in last st of ch 14 with d c ch, 14, join to end of foundation, ch with d c, turn, ch 5, join in top of d c, making another d c, ch 14 sts, join in opposite side with d c, turn ch 5, join in top of d c with another d c.

When you make the 4th ch, knit 7 sts, catch hook through center of 1st ch and draw all four together with s c. Make it all along in same way leaving 1 ch free and joining four together every time.

The edges are finished by making a row of popcorn sts, by placing hook under ch of 5, catch up thread, draw through, catch up thread, place hook under ch, catch up thread, until you have made this 8 times, then catch up st and draw through all.

Make these all along side, making ch 2 sts join to edge between chs of 5. Make ch 2 and join in top of next ch of 5, making another popcorn of 8 sts. When you finish the length of the work in this way turn and make a popcorn under the threads on top of popcorn on previous row, then a popcorn under a ch of 2, then a popcorn under threads on top of next popcorn.

Face Chamois

A cunning idea for a face chamois is to cut it in heart shape and send with it:

"My heart is but a trifling thing,
But you its praises well may sing;
If you will use it long and will
Old age and wrinkles 'twill dispel."

Another chamois motto is:

"Little specks of powder
And little daubs of paint,
Make the great big freckles
Seem very, very faint."

and Useful Ideas for Home-Made Gifts

Wishbone Thimble Holder

THE foundation of this thimble holder is a chicken's wishbone—dried and gilded. No. 50 mercerized crochet cotton or silkateen of any color can be used for crocheting.

Begin by working over one side of the wishbone closely in single crochet, turn about one-half inch from the top, ch 5, 1 d c in 2nd st, ch 2, sk 1 d c, 1 double in next st, repeat, turn at end and work 1 s c, 3 d c, 1 s c under each ch 2. Cover the opposite side in the same way.

THIMBLE HOLDER.

Thimble Holder

Ch 5, join.

1st round.—20 d c in ring, join, ch 3.

2nd round.—1 d c in 1st 3 doubles, 2 d c in 4th, repeat, join, ch 3.

3rd and 4th rounds.—1 d c in each d c, join, end 4th round with ch 5.

5th round.—Sk 2 sts, 1 d c in next, ch 2, sk 2, 1 d c, repeat around, join.

6th round.—1 s c, 3 d c, 1 s c under each ch 2.

Attach this holder to the sides of the wishbone about half way from top as shown. Finish the bottom with 3 small crochet balls filled with cotton, on chains of varying length and a small bow of ribbon.

Using the same width ribbon, sew securely to both sides of the top of the wishbone, tie small bows leaving a loop between for hanging.

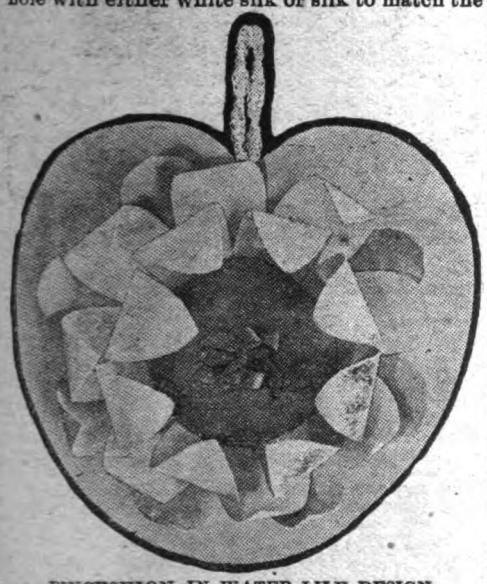
14th round.—1 d c in each d c, join, ch 3.



15th round.—1 d c in 5 d c, 2 d c in each 6th d c, join.

16th round.—Picot edge worked the same as 9th round.

This completes bottom of needle-case. Cut three leaves from white flannel and buttonhole with either white silk or silk to match the flowers used. Fill with assorted needles and tack leaves and covers together with the ecru cotton.

NEEDLE-CASE.

PINCUSHION IN WATER LILY DESIGN.

Pincushion in Water Lily Design

For this pretty and easily made novelty cut from green cardboard a leaf measuring six and one half inches wide and six and one half inches long. And from white cardboard cut out two pieces six and one half inches in diameter, having eight petals, and cut one green piece like this for sepals. For the center of the lily which is the cushion, cut out a round piece five inches across, from yellow sateen—or other material. Gather around edge, draw up until cushion measures three inches across, fill with cotton batting or wadding, to make a flat cushion having a little depression in the center; cut a small round piece of yellow and sew to bottom of cushion.

Curl each petal and sepal, arrange the white pieces and the green sepals on the green leaf having the petals of one piece come between the petals of the other, place cushion in the center; thread yellow baby ribbon—using ribbon double—into a large darning-needle, push needle down through all, near center cushion, leaving ends of ribbon on top of cushion, push needle, with ribbon, up through all and tie the ribbon in a small bow.

If one wishes it to hang on the wall, a green baby ribbon may be used for a hanger, threaded under the ribbon at back, and also a stitch taken with the ribbon, in the leaf, near the top, under the sepals where it will not be seen, ends of ribbon tied or sewed together at back of cushion. The ribbon hanger represents the stem of the leaf.

Camisole in Bluebird Design

BY MARY PUFF.

Materials: Five spools No. 30 white mercerized crochet cotton, 2 spools of blue and 1 of green. The camisole as shown is of white with birds and sprays of forget-me-nots of blue with green leaves. These border the top and bottom, as shown, although the design can be worked throughout in one color if one prefers.

HOME-MADE CHRISTMAS CARDS. NO. 1.

The work is begun as follows: The pattern including five birds is crocheted and then the design repeated in reverse order from the center of the front to form the other side of the camisole.

Begin with 187 sts, 1 d c, in 9th st from hook, ch 2, sk 2, 1 d c (sp), repeat, making in all 57 sps.

Crocheted Horse Reins

These are so simple that even the little lady of the family can fashion them with her own wee fingers for a small brother or little friend.

Odds and ends of wool which has accumulated in every home the past couple of years can be utilized in this way to advantage, all edges being afterwards finished with any dark color or black.

Either Germantown or Scotch are the best materials. The reins are attached to a shield which fits across the chest. This is made as follows: Ch 24 sts, turn, draw up one loop of wool through each ch st, keeping them all on the hook, then work two at a time. Make six rows in this way of afghan st then decreasing 1st at end of each row work until all are narrowed off.

For Reins

Crochet Afghan st on a ch 5 until three yards long, and join the end. Single crochet along both edges. Finish shield in same way. Double the reins and measure ten inches on each side from fold, place top of shield at this point at each side and sew the side of the shield to the edge of the reins. Small balls can be added to point of shield if obtainable.

Dainty Gifts Made from Wall Paper

Dear COMFORT Sisters:

You have helped me out so many times and in so many ways, I am more than pleased to add my mite.

All of the little articles illustrated are easily made and original so far as I know and all were appreciated by those who received them, so I am more than glad to pass the idea along.

For materials one will need some cardboard, library paste, a few brass or ivory rings, remnants of ribbon, a pair of sharp scissors and last but most important some odd lots of wall paper.

If one hasn't the wall paper from a store some paper hanger's sample book can be secured for a small sum.

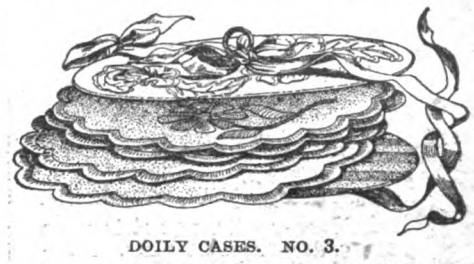
Catch-all boxes can be covered with paper which matches or will harmonize with a bedroom, to hold the odds and ends one never knows quite what to do with. These boxes should each have a gummed label on the end for convenience in marking the contents. Such a set of boxes will certainly be welcomed by any neat orderly housekeeper as it is impossible at times to avoid a collection of unsightly bundles on closet shelves in even the best regulated homes.

No. 1 is my own idea for home-made Chrismas cards which can be made by the dozen in one's spare time.

For each of these one will need an envelope made of wall paper and a card.

Before making these I looked over all my Christmas cards, many of which were perfect but for the name of the sender, making them useless as they were.

They had accumulated from year to year as they were too pretty to destroy and yet seemed useless. But having learned to conserve in other ways, I put my wits to work and evolved my first use for wall paper.



In some cases I covered a used card with paper, copied the sentiment of a small white card and pasted it in place, as shown, using the same paper for both the card and the envelope.

CASE FOR UNANSWERED LETTERS. NO. 2.

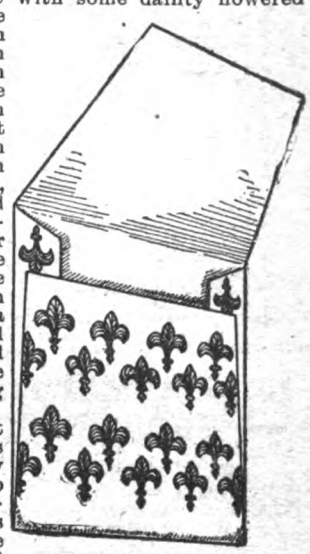
Many of the printed sentiments could be cut from the cards or clippings from magazines may be used.

Pretty illustrated Christmas cards I used with tiny pads in making calendars. For these one will need a bit of ribbon perhaps seven inches in length, slip one end through a small ring and fold back for an inch and a half. Paste the ribbon to the back of a Christmassy view, something bright and pretty in coloring, having the loop and ring come at the top. Over the back of the card paste a piece of wall paper, using a plain but harmonizing color if possible, then on this place a card with either a sentiment or personal message.

DOILY CASES. NO. 3.

To the front add a small calendar pad to the lower end of the ribbon.

Wall Paper Letter Case



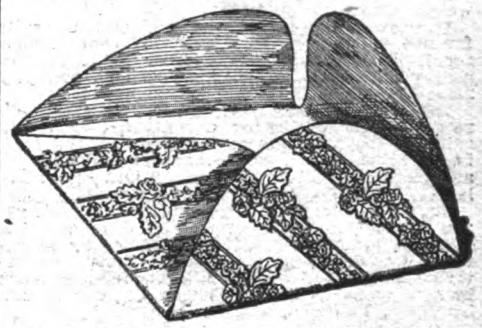
No. 2 illustrates quite clearly the method of making a case for unanswered letters.

I used cardboards for the foundation, one nine by nine inches, and the front one nine by four inches. Cover neatly and tie together with ribbons, allowing a couple of inches leeway at the top.

A larger case for magazines can also be made but heavy foundation board will be needed, and strong round elastic will be better at the top of the front board than just the ribbon.

Doily Cases

Number 3 consists of two circles, either nine inches in diameter or larger. Cover one side of each of these with some dainty flowered paper and the other sides with a plain or satin striped paper. On the under circle carry a ribbon across holding it in place with flowers cut from the same design, and arranged either in the center or to either side. Carry the ribbon across the top and finish the center with a bow and a small ring. This should be sewed in place before the lining paper is put on.



ENVELOPE FOR THE CHRISTMAS GIFT. NO. 4.

No. 4. Most people think as much of the way a gift is done up as of the gift itself, so this shows one of the many unpasted envelopes of various sizes which can be used for stockings, aprons, towels, etc.

These cases with fancy stickers and Christmas ribbon or cord certainly make a package very attractive.

No. 5. Another envelope just large enough for a hankerchief, decorated with a magazine picture of a pretty handkerchief on the flap.

CASE FOR CHRISTMAS HANDKERCHIEF. NO. 5.

To a shut-in who sees little of the pleasant side of things I sent still another envelope containing a Christmas message and seven smaller envelopes with a cheerful motto for each day in the week. Each of these I made of a different color and tied with a pretty ribbon.

Medicine Cover

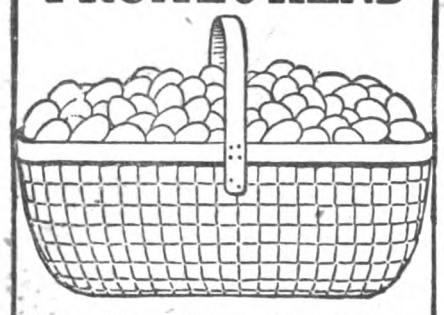
This is just a small circle, a bit of ribbon and ring, but sent to the right person it will prove helpful.

MEDICINE COVER.

These are just a few of the many articles which may be made.

If anyone starts the work numberless ideas will come for similar things.

Post cards which one wishes to preserve may be pasted to a long strip of paper, just the width of the cards, and hung up or folded back and forth.



As these hints for the small gifts are inexpensive, attractive and easily made I, hope they may benefit some COMFORT readers in these days of the H. C. L.

GETS 28 EGGS A DAY NOW, FROM 34 HENS

Chas. C. White, Well-Known Breeder, Tells How. Costs Nothing to Try.

"I gave Don Sung to 34 utility Buff Orpingtons and the egg yield increased from 7 to 28 a day. Don Sung is a wonder and I am now giving it to all my hens regularly."—Chas. C. White, Manager, Cherry Hill Farm, Flackville, Ind.

Mr. White is the well known breeder and exhibitor. He wrote the above letter in December, after his test had shown a gain of 21 eggs a day from 34 hens. We will make you the same offer we made him. Here it is:

Give your hens Don Sung and watch results for one month. If you don't find that it pays for itself and pays you a good profit besides, simply tell us and your money will be promptly refunded.

Don Sung (Chinese for egg-laying) works directly on the egg-laying organs, and is also a splendid tonic. It is easily given in the feed, improves the hen's health, makes her stronger and more active in any weather, and starts her laying.

Try Don Sung for 3 days and if it doesn't get you the eggs, no matter how cold or wet the weather, your money will be refunded by return mail. Get Don Sung from your druggist or poultry remedy dealer or send 50 cents for a package by mail prepaid. Burrell-Dugger Co., 445 Columbia Bldg., Indianapolis, Ind.

Get More Eggs; Save Feed

Sky-high prices for eggs this winter will make big profits for those who know how and what grain mixtures to feed. Improper methods mean big loss. Prof. T. E. Quisenberry made a thousand hens in the American Egg-Laying Contest lay 200 to 304 eggs each in a year. Another big flock cleared for him $6.15 per hen in nine months. His methods are explained in a new bulletin, "How to Get More Eggs and Save Feed." The Value of Artificial Incubation

AN incubator is the foundation of profitable poultry raising.

The first and most important advantage gained by using an incubator lies in being able to hatch chickens early in the season. You all know how madding it is to watch and wait for the hens to cluck, especially if it happens to be a late, cold spring, and then have all your best layers get broody in a bunch when it is really too late to hatch anything but market birds. Unless the heavy birds, like Rocks, 'Dottes and Reds, are hatched in February and March, they haven't time to mature and start laying by November, and unless they do start before real cold weather, there is not much hope of their doing so before spring, which means feeding all winter without returns. It is true, Leghorns, Anconas, or any other of the light weight birds can be hatched as late as May, because they mature very rapidly, but all such birds have been bred specially for egg production, and rarely, if ever, want to set. So you see, it does not matter what kind of hens are kept. It is difficult—nay, almost impossible—to have chicks hatched at the right season to develop into profitable pullets unless the incubator is used.

The second great advantage of artificial incubation lies in the fact that it eliminates many of the causes of infection, such as coccidia and aspergillus fungus, which are likely to infest hay and other materials used as nests. It is much easier to free an incubator from germs or mold-spores; you have only got to burn a fumigating candle in it, or to wash it out with a strong solution of any good disinfectant, to purify after each hatch, and there is no danger of their becoming contaminated; whereas a hen may appear to be healthy when she carries the germs which cause white diarrhea. What is more, she leaves the nest at least once in twenty-four hours, and there is always danger of her carrying back such germs on her feet, and, as you possibly know, eggs can be infected through the shell, with the result that chicks are really doomed before they are hatched.

Eggs laid by healthy hens, and kept in a clean, cool, airy place, and being wiped off with alcohol before being put into the incubator, are safeguarded against these several causes of white diarrhea. Of course, incubator chicks start life absolutely free from vermin, which in itself is a tremendous advantage.

My third reason for preferring an incubator is the saving of time and trouble. Ten minutes night and morning will take care of a machine holding from fifty to three hundred eggs. There is only a lamp to fill and eggs to turn, and I have timed the work frequently, so feel sure about it. Beyond that, a glance at the thermometer at midday and just before retiring at night, if the weather conditions are uncertain, and there is likely to be any great rise or fall in the outside temperature, is positively all that is necessary. And even these two glances can be omitted if the incubator is in a house cellar. Then it is much less trouble to feed and care for chicks which are all together, and all the same age, than it is to go around to several small coops, feed hens one way and chicks another, fill many small water dishes, and clean many coops with old hens fussing during the operation.

Every month for the last thirteen years, has brought me dozens of letters from COMFORT readers; people living all over the country from Jersey to Oklahoma; some of them villagers and others on big farms, and many who started on bare land, and built up a comfortable home, and I can safely say that every one who has reported financial success has had at least one incubator.

Women who wrote me through the paper at first, became personal correspondents and real friends, who tell me their successes and failures without reserve, and amongst them are sixty cases where chickens, aided by an incubator, have saved the farm from going under in years of poor crops or the ill health of husbands.

Perhaps the best illustration of the advantage of using an incubator is the case of a young fellow who started with a six-dollar machine. He was recovering from a terrible accident which had left him almost a helpless cripple. He had only a few hundred dollars, and no relatives except an older brother and his family, with whom he had been living since he left the hospital in the early fall, and it was his sister-in-law's lamentation about the contrariness of old hens who would not set early in the spring that suggested to him the idea of buying a small incubator, which could be operated in his room without too much tax on his meager strength.

The machine chosen was a round metal affair which held fifty eggs. It arrived early in February, but was not filled with eggs until the nineteenth. On the fourteenth of March the proud invalid presented his sister-in-law with thirty-eight bright, strong chicks.

By the fifteenth of June, four more hatches had been made, which brought the number of chicks to the number of two hundred and thirty-three. The first two hatches, consisting of eighty-seven chicks, were given to the sister-in-law, but in making up his accounts, the invalid charged them at eight cents each. The results of the following four hatches were sold as day-old chicks to people in the vicinity, and at the end of June his account stood as follows:

RECEIPTS.

Value of 80 chicks given to Mary,	$6.40
152 chicks sold at 15 cents each,	22.80
Total,	$29.20

EXPENDITURES.

Incubator,	$6.00
20 doz. and 10 eggs,	5.25
Oil,	.60
Total,	$11.85
Balance,	$17.35

The invalid's health improved so wonderfully, his sister-in-law told me, after he had an incubator to interest and occupy him, and the returns, though not large, were sufficient to make him realize that even if the crutch was to be a lifelong necessity, he could still earn something toward his own support if he increased his earning capacity, so he added a dollar to his first season's profit of seventeen dollars, and bought two incubators which held one hundred and twenty eggs each.

The demand for day-old chicks from people living on the outskirts of the town and the city families who came up to their country homes for the summer, had been so much greater than he could supply, and his sister-in-law had such a good market for the table birds she could furnish, that they considered it safe to again increase the hatching capacity. There was the foundation of an old cow barn on the farm. The brother said that he could have this for an incubator cellar. Walling up the opening where the doors had been in front, putting on a roof, windows, and doing some patching where the cement had been cracked, amounted to one hundred and twenty-one dollars.

What kind of an incubator to put inside of the cellar after it was finished took a lot of consideration, but at last he decided on getting one of the mammoth compartment machines instead of several medium lamp machines.

The principal reason for this decision was that in the large compartment machines eggs can be started every day in the week, if necessary, as the operator has complete control of the heat in each compartment, though it is all furnished by the same set of pipes operating from one furnace; whereas, in individual machines the whole capacity of the egg chamber must be put in at one time.

The furnace, pipes, and incubator complete, with extra trays and thermometers, cost one hundred and eighty-two dollars and fifty cents, and held fifteen hundred eggs. Three hundred and three dollars almost used up the young fellow's capital, but he says that he never doubted the wisdom of making the investment, and certainly the results have justified his faith. By July tenth of the first season after the big machine was installed, accounts stood as follows:

RECEIPTS.

7,200 chicks sold at an average of 12 cents each,	$864.00
One small incubator sold at $4.00,	4.00
Total,	$868.00

EXPENDITURES.

Incubator and fixing cellar,	$303.00
Coal,	6.00
Eggs at $5.00 a hundred,	450.00
Total,	$759.00
Balance,	$109.00

Twenty-two hundred eggs set in October and November, and nineteen hundred and four chicks hatched. Eggs cost one hundred and ten dollars. Received for chicks, two hundred and twenty-eight dollars. Net, one hundred and eighteen dollars, making a net profit of two hundred and twenty-seven dollars.

The fourth year there was no equipment to pay for, and the accounts read as follows:

Eggs,	$600.00
Coal,	6.00
Total,	$606.00

Received for chickens, twelve hundred and nine dollars. Net profit, six hundred and three dollars.

I have given you a detailed account of this young fellow's rise from nothing a year to an income of six hundred dollars, because it is wonderful that a semi-invalid, compelled to use a crutch, and unable to endure any outdoor exercise, should accomplish so much from such a small beginning; but if it had not been for his infirmities he could have doubled his success by keeping a flock of pure bred hens, for in that case he would have received from twenty to twenty-five cents apiece for his chickens, and been able to build up a large flock of early layers, which would have produced eggs in the winter when they would have brought the highest market price, because, coming from pure bred stock, they would have been uniform in size and color.

The three fundamental points on which success depends in the poultry business are: First, thoroughbred stock; second, a good incubator, to insure being able to hatch chickens early; third, a well-constructed brooder.

One must be able to hatch these chickens in early spring, so that they will have time to mature and start laying before cold weather, for, if they don't, they will in all probability hold off until moderate weather in the spring.

Even the housewife who keeps a few hens to supply the family table should add a small incubator to her household goods, and the man or woman who keeps poultry as a means of income cannot afford to do without one, for every one who keeps fowls knows how aggravatingly dilatory hens are about wanting to set in the early spring. For some unfathomable reason, amateurs, especially women, have an antipathy to incubators, and seem to regard them as little less than infernal machines, invented especially to hatch deformed freaks, or at least have a dread of undertaking anything so complicated as a hatching machine.

But in truth the up-to-date incubator is as easy to operate as a sewing machine, or even

50 Eggs a Day

Yes—fifty a day. How? Read the letter below.

"'More Eggs' Tonic is a Godsend," writes Mrs. Myrtle Ice, of Boston, Ky. She adds "I was only getting 12 eggs a day and now get 50."

Give your hens a few cents' worth of Reefer's "More Eggs" and you will be amazed and delighted with the results. A million dollar bank guarantees if you're not absolutely satisfied, your money will be returned on request and the "More Eggs" costs you nothing.

"More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit-maker, write E. J. Reefer, poultry expert, 8049 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., for $1.00 package of "More Eggs" tonic.

Poultry Raisers Everywhere Tell Wonderful Results of "More Eggs"

"More Eggs" Paid the Pastor

I can't express in words how much I have been benefited by "More Eggs." I have paid my debts, clothed the children in new dresses, and that is not all—I paid my pastor his dues. I sold 42½ dozen eggs last week, set 4 dozen, ate some, and had 1½ dozen left.

MRS. LENA McBROON, Woodbury, Tenn.

1200 Eggs from 29 Hens

The "More Eggs" Tonic did wonders for me. I had 29 hens when I got the tonic and was getting five or six eggs a day. April 1st I had over 1200 eggs. I never saw the equal.

EDW. MEKKER, Pontiac, Mich.

160 Hens—1500 Eggs

I have fed 2 boxes of "More Eggs" to my hens and I think they have broken the egg record. I have 160 White Leghorns and in exactly 21 days I got 125 dozen eggs.

MRS. H. M. PATTON, Waverly, Mo.

$200 Worth of Eggs from 44 Hens

I never used "More Eggs" Tonic until last December; then just used one $1.00 package and have sold over $200.00 worth of eggs from forty-four hens. "More Eggs" Tonic did it.

A. G. THODE, Sterling, Kans., R. No. 2, Box 47.

1368 Eggs After 1 Package

Last fall I bought a box of your "More Eggs" Tonic and would like to have you know the result. From January 1st to July 1st my hens laid 1368 eggs.

A. E. WHITE, Scranton, Pa.

"More Than Doubled in Eggs"

I am very much pleased with your "More Eggs" Tonic. My hens have more than doubled up in their eggs. L. D. NICHOLS, Mendon, Ill.

So do the birds increase: God implants in the little bird the seed; they grow; then in the spring she chooses a mate to help her care for her family. So two little birds build them a home, or nest, in a tree somewhere; the little egg seeds are placed in the nest. (Sometimes the seed, or eggs, are not their very own, as with the hen or turkey.) Warmth is given to the eggs by the bird's own body; by and by the "egg flowers" unfold, or hatch; by the aid of the parent bird the little "bird flowers" grow into beautiful birds.

Then again, God gives the human mother tiny little seeds to blossom into babyhood. Sometimes these little seeds are found in our own home, sometimes by the wayside, sometimes in the Orphans' Home or "human greenhouse" as plants and flowers are kept; sometimes by unfortunate or dying parents. But wherever they may be found, they are God's little seeds waiting for the kind care of a parent to help them unfold into beautiful flowers.

I am sure your children, Mrs. Wheeler, have gone to the woods or to some neighbor or somewhere to gather plants for their flower garden. If not, go with them some time and help them select plants for a flower garden of their very own (children take more interest in things of their own). Show them, and explain about life, then after the flowers begin to appear, explain that was the way they had been selected to beautify your home and that with their love and your care you hoped to help them grow into more beautiful flowers than if left by the wayside.

I am sure it would please the children to let them help select the new baby sister you spoke of adopting.

I would be thankful to any one who will give instructions for caring for winter bulbs; how to have them bloom and what kind is best for winter blooming.

N. A. BEST.

FROM BEAUTIFUL ATASCADERO IN FARAWAY CALIFORNIA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Is your door bell out of order? I think it must be for I have rung and rung but did not hear a friendly "come in" so I just opened the door and came in and you look so cozy and nice that I want to stay a few minutes if I may. Perhaps you would like to know who it is making so free coming in and talking so glibly. Well I will tell you that here in Atascadero, California—the best place on earth—everybody calls me Auntie Wood and you may call me that if you like. I should like very much to add you to my list of nieces. They are all good to take my advice and heed my counsel. I will not, however, ask you to do so until we are better acquainted. Last Fourth of July several persons asked my age and I said, "Well, after the 13th of next November you may put me down 88, two eights, that is my age exactly, and I learned in school that two eights make sixteen," so now they are calling me sweet sixteen. I am two years older than any woman in the colony. We have a very unique society called "The Veterans of the Cross," the only organization of the kind known to be in existence in the world at this time. We hold a meeting annually, in September, our last meeting being held on the thirteenth of the month. To become a member the candidate must have reached the age of 65 years. At our last meeting we unanimously adopted a Motto and Our Life's Program, as follows:

"Strive to make our lives a blessing to all with whom we come in contact, and so live that the world will be the better because we have lived."

OUR LIFE'S PROGRAM.

Gather up the sunshine and scatter it to and fro,
And make other people happy as through this world we go.
When rich blessings unto us are given,
Praise Him whose dwelling place is Heaven.
When afflictions come, we'll patiently, submissively pass under the rod,
When the angels open the golden gate we will cheerfully, triumphantly go to our God.

Now, dear Mrs. Wilkinson, if you haven't got too tired of me this time perhaps I'll come again. I am an old subscriber to COMFORT and think it is correctly named. I wouldn't think of keeping house without it. It is perfect in every department.

AUNTIE WOOD.

Auntie Wood.—You are really too young to be admitted into the Sisters' Corner but as that is a fault you will overcome in time I am going to let you come in, or rather let you stay in for you seem to have settled the coming in part for yourself. Here's hoping you will be there to welcome me when I become eligible for admission into the Veterans of the Cross Society. I'll begin right now to live up to the motto so as to be ready when that time comes.—Ed.

YOST, UTAH.

DEAR COMFORT PEOPLE:

Ever since the male sex has been admitted to your Corner I have promised myself that I would break in upon you. I'll just take a seat over here by Bill and Mrs. Vesey. Don't scream, I'm not an outlaw even if my hair is rather long. You see, my occupation keeps me isolated from the ladies and with the exception of an occasional sheep herder or cow puncher, away from all human beings. What is my occupation, you say? I am one of Uncle Sam's huntsmen, working for the Bureau of Biological Survey. We are trying to exterminate the predatory animals that each year are killing hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of stock that grow on the U. S. National Forest, and three hundred and sixty-five days of each year I am on the trail of the wild cat, coyote, wolf, mountain lion and bear. We don't have Sundays or holidays here and if I did not have to write a daily report I probably would lose all track of the date.

Lonesome? Well, not so bad. You see, I have the songs of the birds, the wind moaning through the trees, and the ripple of the stream that runs by my camp door, and there are thousands of other things that I love to keep me company. Any time I want wild meat, mountain trout or wild honey all I have to do is to go get it. And as I like to study the habits of wild birds and animals I do not have time to think of getting lonesome.

Why don't you hubbies deposit half your monthly salary in your wife's name and give her a check book; then at the end of the month you can compare notes and see who has spent the most money and if she has bought too much silk and lace just remind her that you are not a bank, and it is a good way to find out if you are spending too much for cigars and taking friends car riding. You will find then that there are better ways of spending money and ways which will be of benefit to both. But for heaven's sake don't nag or quarrel at each other. I think the knocker, the nagger and the crank were made from the material left from making the reptiles and toads.

Mrs. Vesey, I can picture you and your rosy-cheeked, healthy youngsters chasing around in a care-free way, enjoying the things that Nature so abundantly furnishes. There is nothing so grand as being in the lonesome—

Where the woodbine twines,
The whangdoodle sings,
And the frog flips its wings in glee
And the——

I see the stars on Uncle Sam's hat band as he peeps around a tree, wondering why I am not on the trail of the mountain lion that has been killing so much stock in our section.

So long.

S. C. SHEPPARD.

Mr. Sheppard.—Don't feel hurt over my flippant remarks regarding you and your poetry but come again and tell us more of your adventures. Did you get that lion? I'll fix it up with Uncle Sam so that he won't mind if you take time to tell us about it.—Ed.

ARIZONA.

DEAR WIFE IN NAME ONLY:

Your pathetic letter touched me greatly and I hope to help you. Won't you write to me, giving me your name and address.

My dear little woman, such affairs as you describe happen once in a while but are overcome and forgotten, especially if the wife has courage and poise, which qualities you seem to possess.

In the first place, do not nag him about this nurse. It will make him sympathize with her and keep her in his mind.

Keep yourself attractive. Arrange your hair as nicely as possible. Give your complexion care. Keep your home attractive. Cook your husband's favorite dishes. Be as cheerful as possible.

Any new interest will be good for both of you. It may keep you from brooding and also help him to forget this woman. Invite company to your home. It brightens home and makes you seem attractive and keeps the nurse in the background.

Again I say such fascinations often amount to nothing. The good, true wife, by making herself as sweet and lovable as possible, wins entirely and the other is forgotten.

I wish you happiness, my dear.

A FRIEND.

A House that Demonstrates Friendliness

By Frances L. Garside

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

DID you ever notice that houses sometimes assume human characteristics and some just naturally seem to growl at you as you pass, and others look so nice and friendly you wish you had the privilege of walking in?

Well, this house was one of the friendly kind. It was set down in a neighborhood where the other houses looked as if they needed friends, and though its walls had fresher paint, its dooryard was cleaner, its brass knocker was polished bright, a striking contrast to the doorknobs pulled out of their sockets in other doors; though there were nice white curtains at the windows, with plants peeping through, and there was a general air of better care, it was not at all snobbish because of it.

The door opened welcomely; the curtains waved back and forth in gentle greeting, and even the plants seemed interested in coaxing the passers-by not to pass, but to come in. Over the doors there was a sign: "International Institute." The words looked formidable.

"I think," said a woman coming down the steps, and throwing her shawl over her head preparatory toward going along the streets, "that that sign should be changed. 'International Institute' means a lot to those of us who know, but to those who have not learned, how much nicer just 'Friendly House' would look."

I overheard her and went in. If the house was as friendly as it looked, and such was the reputation the woman gave it, it would prove friendly to an inquisitive woman who felt more than a passing interest. I had no doubts of my welcome; I felt the atmosphere of the place the moment I stepped over the threshold.

"The International Institute," said a pleasant young woman at a desk in the front room, "is a house to demonstrate friendliness, and our subjects are the foreign-born woman."

It sounded as if there might be a "story" in it. There was, as you will see.

A man and his wife come to this country from foreign shores, bringing nothing more than a carpet sack of clothing, and a large assortment of hopes. He gets a job. He meets Americans. He learns to speak English because he has to learn it in order to earn a living.

They find a home in a quarter where others have settled who came from their native land. Children come. Children always come, and they come in large, old-fashioned numbers and with old-fashioned speed. They go to school. They learn more than to talk English; they learn to read it and to write it. Father and the children talk together in this new tongue. Mother, in the seclusion of her home, still talks only her native tongue. The family is getting away from her, and it sometimes takes a painful jolt to make her realize it.

The notice from the board of health, from the gas company, and from the milk man,—every bit of writing that comes into her house must be translated to her by her children. The father can speak the language; he cannot always read it.

She finds herself at the mercy of her little Ignace, Jean, Pierre, or Nicholas. They are more than human, they are divine, if they do not interpret for their mother to suit their own convenience.

"Don't mind her," said a little Italian boy to a caller one day. "She's my mother but she can't talk English. She's only a Dago."

The war made life still harder for these women, for the husband enlisted to fight for his native country, or the son packed a grip and went to the front. When their letters came there was no one to read them to her. Fancy what it means to sit facing a letter till the children come home from school to translate it! The International Institute translated many hundreds of letters in the last year to mothers. Some in Syrian, others in French, Italian, Russian, Polish and Greek.

The staff of the Institute is made up of women who speak foreign tongues. The Syrian-speaking woman calls on the Syrians in the neighborhood and interests them in the House of Friendliness. They are invited to come to meet others from their native land, and the social meetings soon drift into classes for the study of hygiene, the care of children, first aid, cooking and sewing, the women taking eagerly to a lesson given in their own tongue.

Nothing is said about the study of English. The necessity of that must come from within, and not from pressure without. Gradually, the Italian woman, who "is nothing but a Dago," and all the other foreign-born women, awaken to a realization of the danger that threatens a home where the children are its spokesmen. They ask to learn English, not because they love their own native land less, but because they love it more, the love for the old home being strengthened by what this new country is meaning to them.

They learn to come to these places with all their problems; they tell their troubles there; they learn to laugh there, and they learn, through association in recreation and studies, something about the problems and sorrows of the other woman, be she from their native land, or from some other for which they have never before had a feeling of sympathy or interest.

The International Institutes are being strung across the continent, like buttons on a charm-string, by the Young Women's Christian Association. The foreign born are here to stay: To make happier and more healthful citizens of them is a problem growing out of the war.

The Y. W. C. A. is doing its bit of this work in going to the aid of the foreign-born woman with these Houses to Demonstrate Friendliness.

It seemed to me the house really smiled a "Come Again" to me when I turned at the corner for a farewell look.

CHAPTER IV.

FIRST REAL CATCH.

JAMES, Sr., and I started toward the east. Fred and his chum took the opposite direction, and soon were out of sight. Following the cinder track, my partner and I walked briskly along. He told me of the days he had hunted through that section of the country, of the game he had killed and of many other things, some of which I suspect were more the products of imagination than actual occurrence. While I listened, the shoemaker talked. And then I discovered that he knew something about trapping. It seems that a companion—who had died years before—used to take mink and muskrat along Rock Creek but he never had a lot of cash because pelts then brought little. John Jones was the pal's name.

"He knew how to trap skunk," James stated, presently. "I know, once——"

I realized then that the son and Fred had put up a job on me, whether intentionally or not. We were headed to traps set for the very animals the man mentioned, animals he really knew how to trap. I had had some little experience with the striped fur bearers and always had given them a wide berth. Right now, I wished that I had followed the water trail instead of the one over the prairies, where, from indications, it seemed sure catches would be made. In fact, just as I was wishing that the Victors would be empty, we came in sight of the spot where we had four sets. My heart chilled as four black spots showed on the level field.

"Whoopee!" shouted James. "Old Johnnie never had no luck like that. Come on." And before I could collect my scattered senses, he was ten yards ahead, pulling a pocket pistol from his coat. I followed as fast as I could but was not able to keep up. When the old hunter got within range, he leaned against a fence-post and, after getting his breath, fired. The aim was good, and with a dull thud the small bullet struck the animal in the head. It fell backward—and there was not the slightest trace of a smell. This gave us both courage—especially me.

"I know how to get 'em," the man shouted quickly. "When you hit the skunk in the spine and cut it, you don't damage the fur and the animals can't throw their odor. I remember once I shot sparrows in the head with this pistol and killed them as fast as they lit in the trees."

By this time he had loaded again and had approached where the second fur bearer awaited. Whether James was excited or his sights were blurred—he claimed this later—I cannot say. Anyway, the bullet struck the trap and went harmlessly on its way. The skunk, however, showed fight. The air became "tainted." And, worst of all, we saw the animal jerk the stake free and vanish into the burrow.

The two of us did nothing to hinder the escape. We turned our attention to the other fur bearers and killed them without much trouble. After this, we went back carefully to the hole where the one had dragged the trap. James said skunks often came out in a case like that and could be gotten again. I had my doubts but at the same time was not anxious to investigate too closely.

Then Fred and Jim appeared. They had three mink, all taken within a few feet of each other. When they had examined the carcasses, they immediately planned to get the animal which had escaped. Blocking the hole so it could not get out, we put the three carcasses in a little stream to wash off any smell which might be on them. After this we started towards town.

After skinning the mink and placing them on boards, we returned to our homes.

"Whew!" mother exclaimed, when I entered the kitchen. "What you been doing now? I told you not to get skunks and for that you can just quit going out with Jim and Fred. Step into the woodshed and change your clothes. You can't come in here with them on."

So this was the end! Cold though it was in that airy woodshed, I did not feel the chill at all. I had worse troubles. Just when our trap line showed results, I should have to quit. But after my earnest pleadings, mother finally relented on my promise that I should not come home with any more smell on me.

Fred and Jim fared no better. However, that afternoon with a fellow who worked in a drug store, reckless in the extreme, we started out with spade and pick to get the game that had pulled out. Our new companion had provided a bottle of some evil smelling fluid he guaranteed would counteract any odor.

The distance was covered in a short time. The embryo druggist led the way; was in a great hurry, in fact. That he was stopped at no danger, we knew, for on other occasions we had witnessed his foolhardy acts. Fortunate, indeed, were the trio to enlist his aid.

We reached the spot and "Dago" began work. First he removed his coat, spat on his hands and then, after removing the rocks we had blocked it with, peered into the burrow. "There's the chain," he exclaimed, grabbing the ring. "I'll pull the skunk out and you hit it over the head."

Jim grasped the spade and waited. The rest of us drew back. With a good hold, the clerk tugged. Then something happened. Out came the animal, smell and all. The pelt hunter with the shovel fled. "Dago" held his ground; then regretted his bravery. Some of the fluid hit him and he staggered away. The animal retreated again into the hole.

"Wait'll I get my breath," he gasped, somewhat pale. "No skunk's got me scared!"

And sure enough, after "Dago" had gotten the fresh ozone into his lungs once more, he took the spade and started toward the burrow again. "Keep away," he shouted. "I'll capture the 'stinker' myself."

The hero this time adopted different tactics. Instead of pulling, he started to dig. When down about two feet, he saw something black. From his pocket he pulled a small revolver which belonged to his uncle and up to now was evidently forgotten. A shot followed. Then triumphantly he lifted the carcass from where it lay.

HE LEANED AGAINST A FENCE POST AND AFTER GETTING HIS BREATH, FIRED.

"Told you so," he said. "Now I'll fill this up——"

"Sufferin' cats! Here's another!" And, catching a glimpse of fur, he furiously resumed his digging. Soon came a muffled explosion, and skunk number two lay on the ground.

"Maybe there are more," he panted, bending to his task again.

When the den was explored, seven fur bearers were captured. With the three we had caught in the morning, they made ten. At two dollars each, that would be twenty dollars. And since "Dago" had done most of the work—in fact, all of it—we offered to share the money with him. We figured each would have about five dollars. This was a large sum of money to us—and to the drug clerk. But to him, our admiration was greater. And what a story he would tell the boys in Stanwood about his bravery when he returned.

If you want to free the neighborhood of mosquitoes, encourage swallows to make themselves at home, says the American Forestry Association, of Washington, which is conducting the national bird-house building contest among school children. These birds feed almost entirely upon obnoxious insects and they will do much toward protecting orchards and other trees from insect pests. No better investment can be made, therefore, than some houses set out for martins or other swallows. Of the blue swallows the purple martin is the largest, the male being entirely blue above and below while the female is blue above with a gray breast.

Give them a trial. (2) Skunks generally throw a small amount of odor when caught in steel traps although sometimes they do not. However, by not exciting the skunk and civet, they usually can be killed with a minimum of smell. The odor may be removed from the clothes, hands or pelt by thorough washing in gasolene. Do this outdoors to avoid danger from fire. Do not confine the fumes. Be sure they are evaporated before coming into the house, barn, etc., especially close to heat or fire.

O. H. W., Pa.—It is almost impossible to state which animals are the most profitable to trap in Pennsylvania. The choice, no doubt, would lie between skunk and muskrat, depending upon the locality. However, with fur prices "sky high," almost any boy in the rural communities can make his spending money for the entire year with a few steel traps in spare time. Read, in COMFORT'S book on trapping, sent free, how the boys caught the animals. Write for it. Ship furs as soon as they are ready for market whether the lots are large or small. In this way one takes no risk of prices lowering. The average trapper cannot afford to gamble with his catch.

V. A., Wash.—There are so many things to guide a trapper regarding dens of various animals that space does not permit going into details. Perhaps the most important is the location; that is, muskrat burrows would not be upon a hill far from water, etc. Then there are the tracks, signs and dropping. These should be studied. A reading of the books on trapping put out by the various fur firms that advertise in our columns will be worth while. Send for them. They are free. Do not overlook the articles that appear in COMFORT, either.

E. E. E., Cal.—Snares for small animals may be made from stout cord or fine flexible wire. It would be better for you to employ steel traps as they are far more effective and cost so little. Even the expert rarely employs a snare, and for this reason beginners ought not to waste their time with it when after the valuable pelts.

Q.—Where do the scent bags of skunk and civet lie?
A.—These are at the root of the tail.

Q.—Is there danger of cutting into them?
A.—Yes, skin around the sacs, leaving a small patch of fur. By so doing, the skins are not damaged.

Q.—What kind of an animal is Hudson Seal?
A.—This fur is the common muskrat you catch—certain quality skins well furred and thin pelt (leather)—which are sheared, dyed and electrified. The name "Hudson Seal" is one given by the manufacturers. The furs resemble the real seal and only a good judge can tell the difference.

Q.—Where can one get skins tanned?
A.—Do not tan skins for shipment to any of the fur houses. If you want to have the pelts made up into garments, employ some custom tanner to do the work. Never try to tan at home. Usually it is a failure and furs are too high now to have them ruined.

Q.—Are ground hogs good fur?
A.—No. There are firms who claim to make them into coats, etc., but most are agreed the pelts are so poor that tanning is a waste of money. The skins are mostly hair.

Q.—What are 'coon tracks like?
A.—They resemble the imprints of a small baby's foot.

Q.—Mention a good bait for mink.
A.—Muskrat flesh is one of the best natural draws. Rabbit is all right also. Fish, frogs, etc., serve, too.

When Johnny has the Croup!

That's a cough with a croupy rattle, so hurry for the Musterole and rub it in right over the chest and neck. How it will tingle at first and then grow ever so cool. And how it will reach in and penetrate right to the spot! It will dissipate all the stuffy congestion which causes that hacking cough.

Why shouldn't grandmother swear by Musterole for colds and coughs? It is better than a mustard plaster—good as that was in the old days. And the explanation is this:

Musterole is made of oil of mustard and other home simples. It penetrates under the skin, down to the part. Here it generates its own heat, and this heat disperses the congestion. Yet Musterole will not blister. Musterole, on the contrary, feels delightfully cool a few seconds after you apply it.

Try Musterole for Bobby and Helen and Dorothy's croup—and for your own cough, too. Try it for rheumatism—it's a regular router out of all congestions. Always keep a jar handy.

Many doctors and nurses recommend Musterole.

30c and 60c jars—$2.50 hospital size.

How to Choose a Dairy Cow

THERE is nothing else so good for the growing child as milk. All young animals need milk. It is Nature's food for the young. Hence there will always be a ready market and an ever increasing demand for milk. The dairy business is the one line of farming not likely to be overdone. Get into the dairy business. If you can't own a herd, you can at least own a family cow.

The Kind of Cow to Keep

Amateurs should not make the mistake of buying pure bred cows. They cost so much that the risk is too great. Better buy cheaper cows. But don't buy "scrubs." "Scrubs" are dear at any price. Buy good but do not pay any fancy prices for them. High priced stock is only for those who know the business thoroughly and who are willing to take large risks. Better buy heifers than old cows. In buying heifers you have equal chances with the seller. Neither one knows what the young heifer will produce. But in buying old cows the buyer is always at the seller's mercy. The buyer gambles on the seller's "sure thing," that is if the seller is a good dairyman and knows his business.

What Breed to Choose

There are many breeds of dairy cows, each having peculiar advantages over the other.

THE HOLSTEIN-FRIESIAN are heavy milkers, in fact the heaviest of all breeds. They are large cows and eat large quantities of rough feed. But, their test is low. The lowest of all breeds. For a cheese factory or condensary cow, they cannot be beat.

THE JERSEYS are the smallest cows and the lightest milkers, but they give the richest milk. For a family cow where the land is so limited that but a single cow can be kept the Jersey is the most desirable. They make fine pets and require less feed and pasture than larger cows.

THE GUERNSEY breed falls in between the Holstein and the Jersey both in amount of milk given and the richness of it. They are very beautiful cows of average size and are especially fine for city milk supply animals. City customers are always satisfied with rich yellow Guernsey milk.

THE AYRSHIRE cow is the favorite with the Scotchman and more nearly resembles the Holstein than the Guernsey. They are rather small cows and for their size give a large quantity of milk a little richer than the Holstein but not so rich as the Guernsey.

THE BROWN SWISS cow looks a little like the Jersey and gives milk a little richer than the Holstein but not so much of it. They are very quiet cows and stand "roughing it" better than any other breed.

But there is so much difference between the individual animals within any one breed that the problem of selecting cows becomes one of selecting individuals rather than of choosing a breed. Of course, one must first decide what breed he intends to keep, but the real problem comes in selecting the cows.

How to Know a Good Cow

All good dairy cows, no matter what the breed, have four characteristics that the buyer should know. They are:

1. Good health.
2. Good feeding capacity.
3. Large milking capacity.
4. Reproduction power.

The expert can usually tell by looking at a cow about what she is in all four of these important points. After this is learned it is comparatively easy to pick out a good cow. This is the way it is done:

FIRST LOOK FOR INDICATIONS OF GOOD HEALTH.—The two things most feared by the dairyman are tuberculosis and contagious abortion. Tuberculosis can only be detected by the tuberculin test unless the animal is very sick from it. Then its poor health is indicated by a dull eye, a rough, staring coat, poor flesh, a hacking cough, running from the nose, and a general run down condition. Good health is shown by bright eyes, sleek hair, fair flesh and a general thrifty appearance.

If no young calves are seen on the place, contagious abortion can be suspected. There is no other easy means of detecting it.

NEXT LOOK FOR FEEDING CAPACITY.—A good dairy cow must eat large quantities of feed to make milk. She therefore must have a large "middle" or barrel as it is called. It should not be "slab-sided" but roomy, full and large. Then look at the nose and mouth which should be large and wide. The eye should be bright but mild, the neck thin, and the back bone prominent.

MILKING CAPACITY NEXT IN LINE.—Heavy-milkers always have large udders and large, prominent and crooked milk veins. The teats should be uniform in size and the udder evenly balanced in the four quarters. A small teat or a shrunken quarter indicates that the cow is a "three-teater."

A fat cow is seldom a good milker, that is, if she is fat at the same time that she is milking. A cow can't put her feed on her back and into the pail at the same time.

Will She Reproduce?

If one is building up a dairy herd he wants his good cows to produce calves equally good or better. How is he to know this in a cow?

If she is well marked, that is, if she closely resembles any one of the leading herds, the buyer can know that she is well bred, and if she is well bred she will produce calves like herself if bred to a sire of the same breed. This is the only way that he can know from appearance what she can reproduce.

If herd records have been kept, the buyer should ask to see them. Good producing cows are likely to reproduce heifers that are good producers. If the purchaser will keep these four points in mind, they will be of great assistance to him in selecting dairy cows.

Why Clover Fails

There are four main reasons for failure of the clover crop. They are: Poor seed, winter killing, sour soil and nurse crop. The latter is probably the most frequent cause of failure, though in the colder sections winter killing is a close second.

Poor Seed and Poor Seeding

In many states the law requires the labeling of seed both as to its purity and its germination power. Even then the farmer must be very careful in order to get good seed. Many noxious weeds, particularly Canada thistle, dodder and ox-eye-daisy, are introduced in the seed. The farmer should carefully examine seeds he intends to purchase with a magnifying glass to be sure that he gets no weed seed. He should also get a small sample and test the germination of a hundred seeds on a wet blotter placed between two pie tins—one inverted over the other. By this method he call tell in six or seven days whether any sample of seed he is testing will grow or not and exactly what percentage. He can also learn by the vigor of growth and the size of sprouts whether it is strong or weak seeds. In these days of high priced clover seed there is much poor and old seed on the market—some of it too poor and old to sow.

Winter Killing

No one knows exactly why clover winter kills because there are several reasons such as the freezing and thawing heaving the soil and breaking the roots, ice sheets smothering the plants, excessive cold on bare fields and weak, sickly plants unable to stand the cold of a severe winter.

The best remedy for all of these is a heavy blanket of vigorous growing plants on the field at the time winter sets in. This holds the snow, helps to keep the ground warm and thus protects the roots against severe cold. It is important for the success of a clover field that it goes into the winter in good shape. This means that it must get the right start in the spring.

The Right Nurse Crop

Much depends on the nurse crop. Clover is usually sown with oats at the usual rate of seed. Two mistakes—the wrong nurse crop and too much seed.

Oats is a heavy feeder and at time of ripening uses enormous amounts of water. This robs the young clover of both food and moisture. If clover must be sown with oats it should be sown at about one half the usual rate of seeding in order to give the clover a chance. Then if when the oats begin to ripen a dry spell is coming on, the oats should be cut at once for hay, leaving the moisture in the soil for the use of the young clover plants. Who has not noticed how much more vigorous the clover growth when the oats have been cut green for early feed! Barley sown at the rate of one bushel to the acre is a better nurse crop than oats. Rye is even still better.

Lime Helps Clover

When clover fails to grow the soil is often sour. Sour soil is indicated by the growth of sorrel and "horse tails." It is easily determined by the use of the litmus paper test frequently described in these columns.

Clover will not grow well on sour soil. The remedy is the use of ground limestone, from two to four tons to the acre depending upon whether the soil is very sour or not.

The farmer who succeeds best with clover tests his soil for acidity, buys carefully selected seed, uses rye or barley for nurse crop because they are off the ground before dry weather begins and this leaves a fine vigorous growth of clover in the ground by the time winter sets in.

The Fruit Garden

Every farm should have a fruit garden. Likewise the family which has no more land than a town lot, we say, should have a fruit garden, and here's the reason:

During the war the commercial fruit grower was often "up against it." Fruit—a perishable product—must be handled quickly. It must be properly handled—rushed through to destination—iced—placed in cold storage and quickly distributed, as a rule. This is particularly true with berries. But the government needed the cars and the railroads. To save themselves, fruit growers had to resort to canning. Large numbers of fruit canneries were built and the canned fruit industry has become a pronounced success. New fruit products in the form of jellies and marmalades have made their appearance. All these canned and preserved products are easily stored and can be kept indefinitely. Hence, fresh fruits have become scarce and relatively high and in all probability will continue to be.

This is why you should have a fruit garden.

What to Grow in Your Fruit Garden

What you will grow depends upon the land available. The town lotter, that is the city or village man who owns a plot of land sixty by one hundred and twenty feet, can have on this land both a fruit and a vegetable garden of sufficient size to grow practically all the fruit and green vegetables used by a small family. This is what he can have in the way of fruit:

Two apple trees, two cherry trees, six currant bushes, six gooseberry bushes, six blackberry bushes, six raspberry bushes, a half dozen pie plants and from fifty to a hundred strawberry plants. This much the town lot gardener can have. Of course the regular farmer will want much more.

How to Arrange the Fruit Garden

By careful planning all the above can be put on a lot of the size mentioned and still have left a space at least forty by sixty feet for vegetables. The fruit trees can be planted in a row and placed fifteen or twenty feet apart. The currant and berry bushes in another row—ten feet away and placed five feet apart in the row. Or a different arrangement is possible with the small fruits placed between the apple and cherry trees. The strawberries for the first two years at least can be grown in the spaces between the rows of other fruit.

In a favorable season of full bearing it will be possible to harvest from one to five bushels of apples, a bushel of cherries, a half bushel each of currants, blackberries, raspberries and gooseberries—and a hundred quarts of strawberries with pie plant "galore" from the above garden.

Ever-Bearing Varieties Good

The ever-bearing kinds of strawberries and raspberries are both good. The quality of these berries is exceptionally fine and they both bear through a long season. While the amount ripe at any one time is never large, there is usually enough ready for a meal. However, in strawberries the bed should not be made up wholly of ever-bearing if any of this fruit is desired for canning. The apples, cherries, currants, goose-

Fox Trappers' Big Catch

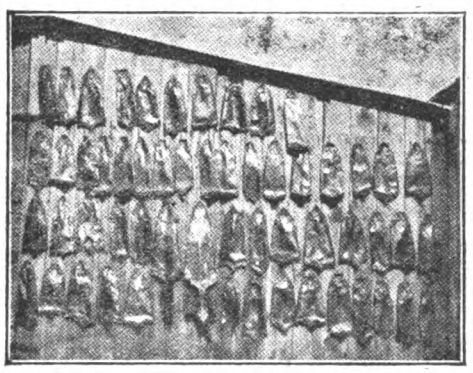
In one week, with 20 traps set, we caught 12 fox and four coon. This catch brought us

THIS IS ONE WEEK'S CATCH OF FOX AND COON—GOT $377.00 FOR SEASON'S WORK.

$176.00. We own two fine fox hounds and with them we have shot 12 fox a head since trapping. We sold all our furs for $377.00. We have had five years' experience trapping and hunting.
FRANK PILBIN AND C. BLANCHARD, Vermont.

Has 98.34 Clean Cash in His Pocket

This letter is to tell you how I trap the wise old fox. First of all, clean cotton gloves should be worn, which should be coated with bee's wax or rubbed in a good trail scent. I bury my traps about two or three weeks in the ground before I set them. I go in the woods where I know there are fox. I take a box or chicken coop and put two roosters in it, then I cut stakes about 2½ feet high and make a path from each side and end. I put the stakes about 3 inches apart in the row and make the path about 6 or 8 inches wide and 6 or 8 feet long. I then fill in between the paths with brush so that he cannot get to the box without going through the path. This very seldom fails to get him. Another way to get him is to go to a tree where a bough hangs over a stump, a rotten one preferred so as to make a place for the trap to set in, hang a chicken or rabbit on the bough right above the stump, so that he will have to get on the stump to get his bait. I use No. 2 Victor or Newhouse traps.
ALTON P. MANCK, Virginia.



P. S. I caught 12 foxes, 10 opossum and 6 muskrat. I sold them and got $98.34, which is in my pocket.

Easy Money and Healthful Practice

My season's catch consisted of 5 mink, 6 muskrat, 1 raccoon, 7 opossum.

I sold 4 muskrat, 1 raccoon and 2 opossum to a local buyer, for which I received $8.00—seven pieces—which had fine fur, too, and I shipped 10 pieces to a fur company advertising in COMFORT, for which I received $24.25, over three times the amount which I received from the local buyer.

It pays to ship your furs to a good fur house. My methods of trapping are as follows: I find a good place where animals travel and set my traps in their runs. For fear the animal may pass my trap, I just leave one path, and for 4 or 5 feet on each side I pile brush, and when Mr. Mink or Mr. Coon comes along he is sure to go the path and gets caught. This applies to all kinds of animals.

Between a fence and a creek is a good place for this. If an animal travels in water along the edge of the bank, lay a stick in such a position as to make him walk over the trap. Place trap between stick and bank.

Yours truly,
J. B. OWEN, Tennessee.

His Hobby Is Muskrat

My season's catch consisted of 17 muskrats, 6 skunks and 6 opossums, which I sold for more than $40. The highest price I received for the muskrats was $2, the opossums $2, and skunk $5. A greater part, of course, sold for less.

I consider the above very good for week-end

WHEN A SKUNK IS CAUGHT HE MUST NOT BE EXCITED.

trapping, as I attend High school in a nearby town, which occupies five days out of a week of my time.

My pet hobby is the muskrat. I hunt along the creek banks until I find a slide or other signs. I then set a trap about two inches from the bank and stake it out in the water so the animal will drown.

In setting traps for skunk and opossum I find a den inhabited by these animals and I make my set with the greatest care, leaving as few signs of my visit as possible.

When a skunk is caught he must not be excited. If possible catch him by the tail and hit him in the neck, right back of the head, by which, if done with care, the disagreeable odor may be done away with.

The skinning, stretching and drying are very important if the top prices are realized. Then the furs must be shipped to reliable firms. (Firms that advertise in the COMFORT can be depended upon.) I inclose with this letter several snapshots of my last shipment, which was made in the first part of February. One important thing to remember is that prime furs bring the most money, so one ought not to commence trapping too early or to continue too late. (Dec. 15 to Feb. 1 is the best time.) GLEN W. DELAVAN, Kansas.

Trapped Fifty Years

I have been trapping for the last 50 years and am now 78 years of age. I sold my furs for $70.25 for the first lot and $30.15 for the second lot. I find the best scent for skunk is to break one half dozen rotten eggs in a fruit jar and shake them up and put a few drops on the bait. A skunk will come as far as he can smell it; good for opossum, too. I am sending you a photo of part of my season's catch, 11 skunk, 4 opossum, 2 ground hogs, with me and my dog.

Poultry Farming For Women

a washing machine, and anybody with ordinary common sense can run them successfully, and raise chickens that will be just as strong and physically perfect as any hatched under hens. And what is more, it is not one half as much trouble to tend an incubator as it is to cater to the vagaries of setting hens. And last of all, there is the unquestionable advantage of being able to control the hatching season and raise chickens which will catch the highest market prices as broilers in April and May.

When the flock runs up to fifty and over, it is best to buy a machine that holds somewhere in the neighborhood of one hundred eggs. Most of the leading firms make three or four different sizes, the smaller of which holds from one hundred to one hundred and twenty eggs. But the beginner, with only a few hens, will find a still smaller size, holding say fifty eggs, quite large enough.

All up-to-date incubators are such well made, perfectly adjusted machines, that any one with ordinary common sense can run them successfully by following the directions and providing one's self with a hygrometer, in addition to the thermometer which accompanies the incubator. For it is quite as important to gauge the moisture as the heat in the egg chamber. A hygrometer only costs about one dollar and fifty cents, and it does away with the most difficult problems amateurs have to solve in artificial incubation.

It is all very well for experienced poultry keepers to say that the amount of moisture can be gauged by the increase of air space at the end of the egg. But the poor amateur can't possibly know how much it should be increased from day to day, and so frequently makes mistakes which cost the lives of many chicks. But when you have this little instrument to tell you exactly what is happening, there is no guesswork.

Raising young chicks in the winter for what are termed early broilers is extremely profitable for those who can run it successfully. To commence on a large scale requires a large capital, but there are hundreds of men and women who have accommodation on their premises that will enable them to start in a small way, and by investing the profits from the first year will be able to obtain a really good equipment for the business. My start in this branch of poultry work was made with one incubator and two home-made brooders. In two years we were operating ten incubators, twenty brooders, and a house for the growing birds, one hundred feet long.

To convince yourself of the profit to be made out of early chicks, just look at the market quotations from New York, Boston, or any large city, on what are termed "Philadelphia broilers," and then consider what it would cost to raise a chick to the killing age. Or, to save you trouble, I will quote from some of my own past experiences.

White Wyandotte chicks, hatched in January, sold in March (when they weighed two pounds apiece) at thirty-eight cents a pound. Cost of keeping, not more than nineteen cents. Several of the same hatch, kept till June, weighed four pounds apiece, and sold at twenty-eight cents a pound. Cost of keeping, thirty-five cents. Last year, January hatched birds brought one dollar and fifty cents the first of April, and had cost forty-five cents. Birds of the same hatch caponized and kept till August brought twenty-five cents a pound, and averaged seven and a half pounds each; cost, sixty-nine cents. Are not such figures convincing?

The farmer can't grow good crops without plows and harrows. Accept the lesson, get an incubator, and have good crops of eggs and chickens. It will pay you tenfold.

C. A. C.—I fear the birds' deaths were caused by roup, which, as you probably know, is a very contagious disease. You did quite right, quarantining the sick birds, and the remedy you used has a very good reputation. But possibly you have a malignant form of the disease to fight. Better get ten cents' worth of permanganate of potassium at a drug store, dissolve two teaspoonfuls in a quart of warm water. For use, dilute one tablespoonful with three of water. Fill a small syringe and spray the throat and nostrils of every bird in the flock. Or, if you have no syringe on hand, add half a cupful of the original solution to a pint of water, put it in a small pan, and dip the entire head into it, holding it in the solution until the bird begins to sneeze and breathe hard. Repeat the treatment three times, allowing two days to elapse between doses. From your letter I take it that you take very good care of your poultry, and keep the house and fixtures clean, but as roup is a contagious disease, the house, drinking and feed vessels, and all fixtures should be thoroughly disinfected.

F. K.—There are several diseases which have been investigated and described as different because the bacteria which cause them differ in some of their characteristics. The symptoms and the changes which are seen after death are so nearly identical that it is only by studying the bacteria that any one of these diseases can be distinguished from the others. The treatment applicable to one is equally applicable to the others. For the practical purpose of combating them in the poultry yard we may therefore group these diseases together. It sometimes happens that this disease develops in poultry yards which are not kept clean, possibly because of the large number of germs which are taken into the bodies of the birds, but probably because they have acquired greater disease producing powers from growing in warm manure. When they begin growing in the tissues of fowls they soon increase their virulence, and the disease which they cause may rapidly spread from bird to bird until the greater part of the fowls are dead. The typical germ of fowl cholera has adapted itself more completely than have these germs to the common conditions of life within the fowl's body, so that it is strictly parasitic, and is only obtained from fowls which are affected or have been affected with the disease. That is, birds only contract true fowl cholera by exposure to contagion that originates in other birds that have or have had the disease. The cholera-like disease may, therefore, either develop in the poultry yard from unsanitary conditions, or they may be introduced by contagion carried by new birds which are added to the flock, by birds which have been to exhibitions, by wild birds which fly from one poultry yard to another, or by various animals, such as dogs, cats, rats, etc. Birds which recover from the disease may sometimes carry the germs and disseminate contagion for six months or a year after they are apparently well. Got 117 Eggs Instead of 3
Says One-Subscriber
Any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. A scientific tonic has been discovered that revitalizes the flock and makes hens work all the time. The tonic is called "More Eggs." Give your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs," and you will be amazed and delighted with results. A dollar's worth of "More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit maker, write E. J. Reefer, poultry expert, 3049 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., who will send you a season's supply of "More Eggs" Tonic for $1.00 (prepaid). So confident is Mr. Reefer of the results that a million dollar bank guarantees if you are not absolutely satisfied, your dollar will be returned on request and the tonic costs you nothing. Send a dollar today. Profit by the experience of a man who has made a fortune out of poultry.

Are You A Woman Who Wants To Become A Better Cook—A Better Housekeeper?
IF so, you need this new book just published by COMFORT.
It is, we believe, the most valuable, most helpful book for the American housewife ever written. For it will help any woman to become a better cook and a better housekeeper—and at a saving of money almost unbelievable in these days of high prices.
Its scores upon scores of tried and proven recipes call for only the most common, inexpensive ingredients, yet you will find them to be the most wholesome, appetizing, satisfying dishes ever eaten in your home. No grandmother of olden days ever made more delicious bread, pies, cakes and puddings than you can make with the aid of these prize-winning, money-saving recipes—to say nothing of the waffles and muffins, turnovers and puffs, cookies and doughnuts, tarts and all kinds of toothsome pastry.
The secret of correct mixing proportions, with tables of cooking weights and measures, are described, as are also the right way to use eggs in cooking and the best methods of cooking and serving meat, fish, chicken, and all kinds of vegetables.
There are pages of special cooking hints—instructions on how to plan and prepare an economical breakfast, dinner and supper for the average family—what to cook for the sick—Ghristmas cakes and candies—Easter luncheons—how to keep food from spoiling in any weather—how to eliminate food waste by making use of "left-overs"—and other bits of helpful advice all contributed by women who are expert cooks and know what they are talking about. But this book is More Than A Cook Book!
In it you will also find countless household hints and suggestions that will enable you to make, with your own hands, and at practically no expense, many new labor-saving devices for the kitchen and articles of needed furniture and decorative furnishings—you will learn how to have an efficient kitchen—how to save fuel, oil and gas—to care for, clean and conserve clothing and household utensils—to take "short cuts" in washing, housecleaning and the other hundred and one housewifely duties in the home.
It also explains how to prepare and can all kinds of meats, vegetables and fruits by steam pressure—how to can and preserve fruit in season, with special recipes for jam, jellies, etc., etc.,—how to dry vegetables and fruit—how to salt, pickle and ferment green vegetables for winter use.
Then there are pages devoted to home and the care, culture and housing of winter plants and winter blooming bulbs, all of which are of unusual interest and fascination to the wife and mother, while for the men folks there are articles on the use of paint, and light and power plants.
There is still more in this great book but lack of space prevents a further description. Let us send you a copy—it will cost you nothing if you accept our free offer below. It is a handsome book of 192 pages, 6 inches by 8½ inches in size, and many illustrations, printed on fine paper, durably bound, with illustrated colored covers.
FREE OFFER. For only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents, we will send you a copy of this book—"COMFORT'S Home Maker's Help and Family Guide"—free by mail postpaid. Premium No. 8301.

BREAKS ALL RECORDS IN EGG PRODUCTION

Yes, the world's record in egg production was broken by 5 different flocks of hens in one month by the use of "TWO FOR ONE" egg tonic.

P. S. Siegrist of Logan, Kansas, the winner of $250.00 the 1st prize given in our September egg laying contest reports that his 10 hens laid 299 eggs during the month of September, or 99.7%, almost a perfect score.

Mrs. E. M. Halsted of Strawberry Point, Iowa, winner of the second prize of $100.00 has a record of 1466 eggs from 50 hens, or 97.7%—the winner of our 3rd prize of $75.00, Miss Viola Smith of Udell, Iowa, received 810 eggs from 28 hens or 96.4%.

It is seldom that world's records are broken more than once in any event, but in this contest there were five individual poultry raisers who did this very thing.

The 4th prize was won by Mrs. E. W. Pingel, Pulaski, Wisconsin, whose record for September was 231 eggs from 8 hens or 96.2%, and the winner of the 5th prize, Judge A. R. Berryhill, Vada, Missouri, who received $25.00, making a record of 1600 eggs from 56 hens or 95.2%.

These are the records of the first five prize winners in our September egg laying contest. Each of these statements was sworn to and witnessed before a notary public. They are only samples of the thousands of letters that are coming in to us from poultry raisers throughout every section of the United States who are amazed and astounded at the truly marvelous results obtained by using "TWO for ONE."

Nothing Like It in the History of Poultry Raising

September results in the great "TWO for ONE" $5,000 egg production contest have astounded the whole world. Nothing like it was ever heard of before. Records are falling North, South, East and West. All of the best efforts of poultry raisers heretofore pale into insignificance when compared with results obtained from the use of the great poultry tonic.

World's Greatest Egg Producer

"TWO for ONE" tones up the flock. "TWO for ONE" makes laggards lay. "TWO for ONE" has been tried and tested in every state in the Union—was not put on the market until we were assured of results. "TWO for ONE" is sold under a positive guarantee—your money back if you are not satisfied. "TWO for ONE" keeps flocks healthy and prevents disease. "TWO for ONE" makes hens lay, even while moulting. "TWO for ONE" will beat the best your poultry yard has ever done. "TWO for ONE" will double, triple, may even quadruple your egg profits.

$5000.00 EGG LAYING CONTEST

To encourage chicken raisers, stimulate egg production and introduce "TWO for ONE," the scientific hen builder and egg producer, we offer every user of this wonderful tonic the opportunity to enter our egg laying contest where the size of your flock matters not at all. Boys, girls, men or women may enter and all stand equal chance—no strings—no entry fee—no obligations—nothing to keep you from winning one of the magnificent prizes we are giving and at the same time get more eggs from your hens than you ever dreamed possible—making producers and real money-makers out of every single, solitary hen you own.

Remember these prizes are free to users of "TWO for ONE"—no strings—no entry fee—no obligation of any kind. All you have to do is to fill in coupon and give your hens "TWO for ONE." If you have only 10 hens you have the same chance as the owner of 1000, as the prizes are all awarded on a percentage basis. Open to all men, women and children:

35 PRIZES EVERY MONTH

We will give 35 prizes each month to the owner of the flock of hens producing the most eggs in proportion to the size of their flock for the months ending September 30, October 31, November 30, December 31, 1919, January 31, February 29, 1920. Winners will be notified on the 15th of each month. Read the following list of monthly prizes carefully:

1st Prize	$250.00
2nd "	100.00
3rd "	75.00
4th "	50.00
5th "	25.00
10 next " each	10.00

The House That Returns Your Money If Not Satisfied

NOTICE

Owing to the steadily increasing cost of the ingredients used in the preparation of our "TWO for ONE" tonic, we will be forced to increase the price when our present supply is sold. At the present time we are unable to state just when this will be, but it appears from the enormous demand now being made on us by the public for our tonic that the supply is likely to be exhausted in the very near future, our advice to poultry raisers is to lay in a large supply at the present market price and avoid the increase which is sure to come in the near future.

berries and pie plant should furnish an abundant canning supply.

What to Buy

For the northern section the following varieties are all good and particularly hardy:

Early apples: Yellow transparent Duchess, Whitney crabs and Tolman sweets.

Late apples: Baldwin, Wealthy, McIntosh and Greening.

Cherries: Early Richmond and Montmorency.

Currants: Perfection, Fay and Victoria.

Gooseberries: Downing and Pooman.

Raspberries: Ever-bearing, Cumberland (black caps) and Cuthbert (red caps).

Blackberries: Snyder and Rathburn.

Strawberries: Progressive, Ever-bearing, and some local variety particularly adapted to your state.

There are many other varieties and some better adapted to certain localities, but these are the standard sorts whose adaptation covers a wide range of conditions.

Where to Buy

If you know of a seedsman or nursery agent with which you or your neighbors have dealt with satisfaction, buy of him. Poor stocks are often peddled by unscrupulous salesmen. Reliable dealers are not afraid to advertise their goods.

Consult your farm papers and other publications to learn who these men are.

What Does It Cost to Keep a Rat?

Have you a rat? Or maybe two or perhaps a whole litter of rats? If so, have you ever figured the cost of keeping a rat? A good healthy rat will eat two bushels of corn a year and spoil three more. At present market prices two bushels of corn are worth $3.20 and five bushels are worth $8.00. A nice little colony of ten rats in the corn crib will eat and destroy about $80.00 worth of corn this year. Does it pay to keep rats?

How Idaho Has Got Rid of Ground Squirrels

The farmers of Idaho have been fighting ground squirrels, which are worse than rats in that state. They use powdered strychnine for this purpose. The "poison bait" is prepared by mixing two tablespoonfuls of gloss starch in one cupful of cold water and then stirring the cold starch into one pint of boiling water to make a thin, clear paste. Then two ounces of powdered strychnine is mixed with two ounces of baking soda in a little water and the whole thoroughly mixed with the starch water into a thin creamy paste. Then one half pint of corn syrup, two tablespoonfuls of glycerine and one tablespoonful of saccharin are dissolved in water and the whole stirred together. The whole mass is then mixed with twenty-four quarts of oats and scattered over the land near the holes, about a teaspoonful in a place. Of course the poison will kill pigs, chickens or other livestock if they are allowed to get at it.

Bait Hard to Make

The recipe for making the poison bait is rather complicated, but it is very effective. The sweet is used to make the bait palatable—the soda helps hide the bitter taste of the strychnine, the starch sticks the poison to the oats (or barley) and the glycerine prevents it from drying out and dusting off. It can be stored and kept for a long time.

Weeds Gather Fertility

The esteemed editor of one of our contemporaries has sprung a rather new suggestion relative to the fertility gathering function of weeds. He wrote that he had been busy mowing high weeds in the fence corners of his worked orchards and fields, and, by way of apology for their presence, stated that he believed such weeds gathered potash and other plant food from the ground in corners not utilized in any way and that this fertility might be applied to the soil where most needed by piling the cut weeds about the roots of orchard trees. His idea is that the weeds will rot and yield up their treasures of potash and other fertility to the growing, profitable fruit trees. That, no doubt, is so and heavy growth of green weeds plowed under are as good as some other green crops in supplying nitrogen. But clover and alfalfa, or sweet clover, gather far more nitrogen than ordinary fence corner weeds such as burdocks, wild hemp, ragweed and milkweed. The fence corners may be dug and seeded and made to produce valuable soiling forage, or crops for hay, and we have seen many a fine squash or pumpkin produced in such corners where weeds were wont to grow. All things considered, a clean fence side and corners are to be preferred to weedy ones and if time and help allow, weeds should be kept down and other sources of fertility that are much safer, should be depended upon for plant food.

Soldier Boys Back to the Farms

To get back home—home to God's country—was the one overwhelming wish of every American soldier boy when the din of the world war ceased. And if that home happened to be on a farm, so much the harder did the longing tug at the heart-strings, and now we rejoice that most of the boys are enjoying their heart's desire. For all the splendor and gaiety of Paris did not wean them from their first love, nor were they tempted by sightseeing in many an overseas village and city to avoid going back to the land on their return.

Once it was a problem how to keep the boys on the farm; now you can't scare or chase the returned soldier away from it, for mother is there and the one best girl, and peace and quiet, plentiful, wholesome food and a downy bed for honest, work-tired bodies. And so we are told that 98.2 per cent of the soldier boys who came from farms are making a beeline for the old homestead, the shady swimmin' hole and all the loved, familiar scenes of boyhood's happy days when the wide world was a dream and war a thing unthought of. Colonel Arthur Woods, assistant to the secretary of war and chief of the employment bureau for returned service men, is authority for the figure quoted and he asserts further that of the 1.8 per cent of those who do not return to the farm, 1 per cent are physically disabled for heavy outdoor work.

Good luck to our farm boys who have come back to us! They cannot find a grander, safer, sweeter place to live than down on the old farm; and they are needed there, as are thousands of able-bodied men now unprofitably employed at irksome work in the cities.

Questions and Answers

BEE CULTURE.—Kindly inform me where I can purchase a book which gives full details of raising and caring for bees. I have become interested in the subject through reading COMFORT.

H. W. L., Forest City, Iowa.

A.—Apply to the agricultural experiment station of your state for bulletins on bee culture and also to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. Books on the subject may be ordered through any bookstore in your city.

PLANTING TREES.—Father has bought a farm and next spring we are going to set out fruit trees. Can you prescribe the right way to plant them? In what month and how far apart should they be set? Is it all right to raise them from the seed or should we plant young trees? Kindly give me all information you can.

MISS C. G., Bloomington, Ill.

A.—We cannot give full information on such a subject in the space at our disposal. The nurseryman who supplies you with trees will give you full instructions, or you will find them in his catalogue, and in addition you should write to the state agricultural experiment station at Urbana for free bulletins on all farm matters, including tree planting, fruit culture and gardening. Hire an expert to plant the trees at the proper time in spring, according to the climate of your district. You may be able to learn from him how to do the work, but no person who has not had training or experience should attempt such work. We would also suggest that if a farmer's short course is to be given at the state agricultural college this winter you should arrange to attend.

ENSILAGE TOO DRY.—Following COMFORT'S advice as to the value of corn ensilage, we built a silo and finished filling it a week ago, but the contents is getting moldy in places where it looks to be dry. The mold extends to the depth of about one foot. I put in about 50 loads of corn and while filling I put on quite a lot of salt and water, and when filled I added four or five barrels more of water. Some distance below the surface it is very hot. Do you think it should have more water added?

MR. H. H., Irma, Wis.

A.—Your corn was too dry when cut into the silo. Add water when filling and tramp it down well. Pack close to keep from molding. You did the right thing in adding water but you didn't put on enough and did not pack your silage enough.

Poultry Farming for Women

first symptom is a yellowish coloration of that part of the excrement which is secreted by the kidneys, and which in health is nearly or perfectly white. Soon there is diarrhea, the droppings consisting of the whitish or yellowish secretions of the kidneys mixed with considerable thin mucus and a small quantity of intestinal contents which may have a yellowish, brownish or greenish color. There is a considerable fever, and soon after the bird is attacked it loses its lively appearance, separates itself from the flock, and appears dull, dejected and sleepy. It no longer searches for food, but sits with the head drawn down to the body or turned backward and resting in the feathers about the wing. The plumage soon loses its brilliance, the wings droop, the appetite is diminished, and the thirst increased; the comb and wattles may be a dark bluish red from engorgement with poorly oxygenated blood, or they may be pale and bloodless on account of the congestion of the internal organs, especially the liver. The affected birds soon become very weak, drowsy, and often sleep so soundly during the last day or two of their lives that it is difficult to arouse them. If made to move, they stagger forward for a few steps only in an uncertain manner and with dragging wings. The crop is generally distended with food and apparently paralyzed, and the feathers about the vent are soiled and sometimes pasted together with excrement. As death approaches, the weight and strength of the bird rapidly diminish, it breathes with difficulty, sits with its beak open, and the breathing may be heard some distance. Finally the weakness is such that the beak is rested on the ground, and a little later the bird falls over on one side, makes a few convulsive movements, and dies. In the very acute cases no symptoms are seen; the birds may be found dead under the roosts, or they may fall at the food trough and die in a few minutes. The cholera-like diseases often occur in a chronic form, which may follow an acute attack of the disease or may be chronic from the first. This form is characterized by a continually increasing weakness, loss of weight, bloodlessness, and finally an exhaustive diarrhea. Sometimes one or more joints of the wings or feet swell, the birds become very lame, and later the swellings break and discharge a creamy or cheesy mass which contains large numbers of the germs. These diseases may destroy the greater part of a flock in a week and then disappear, or they may linger for months, only occasionally killing a bird. The time between the exposure to contagion and the appearance of symptoms is from two to five days, and the duration of the disease is from twenty-four hours to ten days. The most characteristic changes seen after death are red spots on the surface of the heart, which gives it the appearance of having been sprinkled with blood, congestion and enlargement of the liver, and swelling of the spleen. The best method of treatment is to kill the sick fowls in such a way as not to spread the infection with their blood, burn or deeply bury their bodies, separate the remaining birds into small lots of three to five each, so that when a bird is attacked there will not be more than this number exposed to it; then watch each lot so as to remove any sick bird as soon as symptoms appear. Disinfectants should be used in the houses and yards where the disease first appeared, and also in the small pens in which the separated birds are kept. If it is deemed advisable to treat the sick birds, they may be given two to four teaspoonfuls of a one half per cent carbolic solution twice a day. This is generally made by adding one part of the five per cent solution to nine parts of water. They should also be given buttermilk to drink. Generally, the best results are obtained by killing the sick birds and separating the well ones into small pens and giving to each one two doses of the carbolic solution daily for three or four days. The houses and yards should be thoroughly cleaned and disinfected before the fowls are returned to them, and should be kept very clean for some weeks afterwards to guard against a recurrence of the disease.

Wonderful Egg Producer

Any poultry raiser can easily double his profits by doubling the egg production of his hens. A scientific tonic has been discovered that revitalizes the flock and makes hens work all the time. The tonic is called "More Eggs." Give your hens a few cents' worth of "More Eggs," and you will be amazed and delighted with results. A dollar's worth of "More Eggs" will double this year's production of eggs, so if you wish to try this great profit maker, write E. J. Reefer, poultry expert, 3049 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., who will send you a season's supply of "More Eggs" Tonic for $1.00 (prepaid). So confident is Mr. Reefer of the results that a million dollar bank guarantees if not absolutely satisfied, your dollar will be returned on request, and the tonic costs you nothing. Send a dollar today. Profit by the experience of a man who has made a fortune out of poultry.

Crawled— Now Walks

Infantile Paralysis caused the deformity. Two years after treatment at the McLain Sanitarium his mother writes:

"When we took our boy to the McLain Sanitarium he had to crawl on his hands and knees; after six months treatment (Summer of 1917) he could walk alone. It is now two years since he took the McLain's treatments and he has continued to improve every day since he came home."

Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

Transmission

THE purpose served by the clutch was explained in our November article. Back of the clutch the transmission is the next unit in order. As probably every driver knows, the real purpose of a transmission is to afford a variety of speed ratios. The steam and electric autos do not require a transmission for the reason that the stored power is available when more power is needed. For illustration, consider the steam auto. In deep sand or on a hill where more power is needed, the operator simply opens the throttle and admits more steam. However, such flexibility is not true of the gasolene internal combustion motor. Without outside aid, so to speak, its work is limited. First, let us consider an automobile using gasolene motor power and not equipped with a transmission. We will say that this motor has four cylinders and at 1500 R. P. M. it develops 24 horse-power. For each complete revolution of the crank-shaft there would be two power impulses delivered. There would be 3,000 power impulses when the motor is turning over at 1,500 R. P. M. In other words, we are assuming that the motor is delivering its maximum horse-power, which is 24, when the motor is turning over at 1,500 R. P. M., and that 3,000 power impulses have been delivered to the crank-shaft in that period of time. As long as we would drive this car on a hard level road we would experience practically no difficulty as it requires little power to keep the car rolling under such conditions as above described, after it has been started. However, all roads are not hard and level and we will now consider the climbing of a hill. Even the pedestrian appreciates that the hills tax his strength much more than the level. The engine of course must work harder, or it must produce more power to propel the car up the grade. There is no reserve to call on and as the grade becomes steeper, the engine slackens in speed, and necessarily the horse-power diminishes, pounding is heard and finally the motor stops because the load became too great for it to handle. However, a condition such as outlined above is not actually experienced except it be by a novice who is not familiar with gear shifting. A transmission is installed in the car to change the speed ratio when the load becomes too great for the engine. On some cars the change was carried out by the use of two discs set at right angles to each other. One disc was directly coupled to the engine and served to drive the other disc which was a movable member. It will be understood that the speed of the driven disc would decrease as it was carried toward the center of the driving disc. The speed of course would increase as it was carried toward the outer edge of the driving disc. For reverse, the driven disc was carried across center to the opposite side of the driving disc. The drive is by friction and usually the driven disc was faced with compressed paper or some other material to insure friction. This method for changing the speed ratio is almost extinct and the sliding gear transmission, which is the one found on the majority of cars, will be described in the next issue.

SLIDING DISC TRANSMISSION.

Some Useful Pointers

Release Clutch

During the cold weather it is excellent practice to release the clutch before starting the engine. Keep the clutch disengaged while turning the motor over with the starter. You may argue that the starter will turn the motor over with the clutch engaged, but there is danger of burning the starter armature and the consumption of current is great. On a cold day, turn the motor over with the hand crank while the clutch is engaged and then turn it over again with the clutch out. It will then be realized the additional power required to turn over the gears in the transmission which are given great resistance by the grease which has been hardened by the cold. If you must leave the clutch engaged, thin the lubricant in the gear case or use one not affected by the cold.

Steering Gear

As practically every motorist knows, the steering gear is that mechanism on the car which controls the direction or course taken by the front wheels. Steering gears may be placed under two general headings, viz., reversible and irreversible. In its simplest form the reversible type of steering gear consists of a rack and pinion arrangement. The pinion is keyed or otherwise securely fastened to the lower end of the steering shaft and meshes with the rack which is in turn connected to the steering arms. This type of steering gear is quick acting. It is termed reversible for the reason that it is possible to transmit road shocks through the front wheels, steering arms and gear to the steering wheel. However, the use of multiple gears at the base of the steering column has eliminated this feature and yet affords just enough play to cushion the road shocks instead of permitting them to be absorbed by the steering arms and pins. The irreversible type of steering gear consists usually of a worm fastened to the lower end of the steering shaft and meshing with a gear which connects with the steering arms. Due to the fact that it is impossible for the gear to turn the worm, it is plain that the road shocks cannot be communicated to the steering wheel. Certain advantages and disadvantages are claimed for each type but in all fairness it must be said that both have been developed to a point where they give very satisfactory service.

Carbon Explained

The lubricating oil used for the gasolene internal combustion motor generally consists of about one part hydrogen and eight parts carbon. Providing it were possible to design a ring for the piston which would insure the clean wiping of the cylinder walls, the accumulation of carbon in the cylinder head and on top of the piston would be negligible. However, such an ideal condition does not exist in the average motor and a certain amount of oil eventually finds its way up into the cylinder combustion chamber. Due to the high temperature of that chamber, partial decomposition of the oil takes place. As a result, the free carbon in the form of fine dust is blown out with the exhaust gases. Not all of the free carbon can get away and this remaining portion settles on top of the piston, cylinder, spark plugs, etc. Some motors may go for a long time without carbon trouble. However, sooner or later, due to natural or other conditions, every motor seems to require the removal of carbon. There are advocates of the oxygen method for the removal of carbon but before adopting same, it is advisable to obtain the advice of the car manufacturer. Due to construction and design many manufacturers advise strongly against the oxygen method for the removal of carbon from their motors.

Cold Weather

Cold weather presents certain problems which are not easily solved by all drivers. Hard starting is to be expected, especially if the car is stored in an unheated garage. The present-day gasolene is of a low grade and is not readily vaporized. To compensate for such a condition, it is necessary to increase the suction at the carburetor which in turn increases the amount of gasolene mixed with the air. As the temperature of the motor rises, the suction at the carburetor may be gradually decreased. The one factor to keep in mind is heat. It is the only agent which will insure complete vaporization of the fuel, and without complete vaporization trouble will be experienced. Many cars are fitted with an air heater which in turn is provided with a shutter which should be open in warm weather and closed in cold weather. Closing the shutter causes the air to be drawn around the hot exhaust manifold and brings it to about the same temperature as the air during the warm weather. Bring about a summer condition around the motor as much as possible and the cold weather difficulties will disappear. A cover which fits the hood and has a flap for the front of the radiator is desirable. A properly designed cover of that type will retain the heat around the motor which naturally assists starting. For city driving during the very cold weather, the fan belt can be removed. However, do not make long trips without a fan belt and be sure to replace the belt on mild days. About every 500 miles drain the old oil from the motor and replenish with fresh lubricant.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

EAST TEXAS.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have enjoyed your letters, especially those that told of travel and of the care of children.

I think motherhood is the highest "calling" anyone can have and next to that are the good women who take other little ones into their homes and hearts to rear as their own.

Sister, of Arizona, your letter was sad. Perhaps your husband was only in a pet when he said he had never been happy with you. When he seems to be pleased with you ask him kindly if it is true, and why. If, as you think, it was because he was disappointed in love years ago, it is very ungenerous and cowardly of him to blame you or allow you to be unhappy because of it for surely you are to be pitied, not blamed. He appears rather selfish to me. As for leaving him, I would let him decide that. If he is willing to accept his happiness at the expense of an innocent victim he isn't worth worrying over, and remember we can make our own lives and perhaps some day you will feel that Heaven was kinder than you knew. But I am inclined to think he will not let you go. Sometimes we fail to appreciate our treasures till we are about to lose them.

Wife in Name Only, my heart aches for you. But I think there is hope for you as your husband has been true in deeds if not true at heart. Perhaps this is only a passing infatuation. It seems to me you have both acted very honorably and sensibly in talking it over quietly and since he does not desire you to leave I think your place is in your home. Be cheerful and pleasant and above all try to avoid an injured air—no matter how injured you feel—for a man always detests sighs and tears, especially if he feels guilty. Put on your prettiest dress; cook his favorite dishes, and pretend to forget what has passed. Be a real companion and be patient, kind and true and I believe you will win him back. For the sake of you and "A Sister", I am going to tell a little of my past. I dearly loved a young man but through a misunderstanding I married another. I learned my mistake only a short time before my marriage and could have saved my unhappiness at the expense of that of my intended husband. But I knew he was not to blame and felt he was too good to suffer for my blunder, so I married him and have been a faithful wife for fourteen years. For several years the sight of the one I had loved caused my heart to beat like a hammer. But gradually it wore away and now I would not give my dear husband for half a dozen like him, though both are good men.

Will not each of you write later to let us know how you are progressing?

WOULD HELP.

THE ARMY TEST

Passing the doctors for the service was the first knowledge that thousands of men had that they were below par. The little pains and aches they were accustomed to were really warnings of physical weakness. Don't wait for serious trouble to develop. They may be the first warnings that your kidneys need help. Possibly gravel or uric acid crystals are beginning to form.

No matter, you can stop this at once. Gold Medal Haarlem Oil Capsules will give almost immediate relief from kidney and bladder troubles, which may be the cause. Take them regularly and your pains and aches will disappear and you will be able to pass any test at any time. Gold Medal Haarlem Oil Capsules are imported direct from the laboratories in Holland, are pleasant and easy to take and are positively guaranteed to give prompt relief, or your money will be refunded; but be sure to get Gold Medal Haarlem Oil Capsules, and accept no substitute. In sealed boxes, three sizes.

The Talcott Treasure

sent," she declared, shaking her head positively.

"Still, the thing's possible," argued David Muir. "Don't you see that it is? Even probable. And, if it isn't, nobody'll ever know. It's worth trying, don't you think?"

"Y—es," hesitated Nancy, "I do think so—in fact, I'd be glad to. And, if she doesn't, I'll do it myself, that I will!"

"Bully for you, little pal!" exulted David Muir. "That's the stuff. You are not afraid? If you are, I'll help."

"No—oh, no—not a bit. But I must tell Eleanor first—maybe she'll consent, after all; she's nearly desperate, poor child, and no wonder; it'll kill her to give up this old shell, and she'll starve if she stays here."

That night, when the shades were drawn and the lamp flickered dimly in the big room, Nancy, shivering a little at the task before her, seated herself beside her friend and whispered: "Eleanor, something has come to me about the treasure—I believe it—it's buried!"

Eleanor sat bolt upright; her eyes glowing. "Where?" she breathed, "Oh, Nancy, have you thought where?"

"I believe," gulped Nancy, bravely, "I believe it's—buried—in—that—little—unknown—grave!"

Then, before Eleanor had time to express the horror shown plainly in her eyes, Nancy went on breathlessly, tumbling over her words, eager to impress Eleanor before she had made up her mind to forbid the sacrilege.

"For you know, honey, it isn't at all probable that one of the slaves should be buried there, when their own graveyard was set apart for them—nobody knows how it came to be in your own cemetery. What could be more probable than for Colonel Talcott to think of that—of burying the gold in a—a grave, where nobody in the world would think of searching—unless they were vandals——"

"As we would be, Nancy," interrupted Eleanor, her eyes wide with horror. "As we would be—if we desecrated the last resting-place of the dead!" Her voice trailed off in a shaken whisper, choked with the thought of the awful sacrilege!

"Surely, if we knew it to be a grave, really and truly," agreed Nancy, promptly. "But we don't—we know it—it probably isn't, in fact."

"What on earth made you think of such a horrible thing, Nancy?" asked Eleanor, still wide-eyed, her voice still shaking.

"It—it just come to me," lied Nancy, bravely, "because such strange things happened in war-times, you know, and if you'll just think about it in an unprejudiced way, you'll realize that it isn't at all a sacrilege. You see, if we were to—to come to—a——"

"A coffin," whispered Eleanor, tensely. "What should we do?"

"It would probably be rotted to pieces, in this long time—half a century; if there were—bones, why, we'd just cover 'em up, and nobody be a bit hurt—not a bit!"

"Nancy, Nancy, I can't," whispered Eleanor, with closed eyes, as if she would shut out the horror, "it's too awful to think about."

"Well, let me do it—I am not a bit afraid," declared Nancy, stoutly. "You know the grave is newly mounded—the earth is soft—while everybody is asleep tonight—the moon is full, you know—we—or I, will go and—try!"

"Not alone—Oh, Nancy, not alone—I won't let you," vowed Eleanor, bravely. "I consider it to be desecration—sacrilege, in fact; but if you will go, I'll go with you. The poor little pickaninny is in heaven, any way. If you will go, Nancy, I won't forbid you—and I'll go with you!"

"Well, don't speak in that Lady Macbeth tone," objected Nancy, greatly relieved at this decision, "we are not going to do a thing wrong by opening that—mound. I don't for one minute believe it to be anything else, myself. Uncle Bahama said he didn't know how it came to be there—that it was just a—a kind of rise, so to speak, but that Old Miss took it in her head it was a grave of one of the servants, and made him keep it mounded up. You know he said so, Eleanor!"

"Yes; he did—but I don't believe a word of it—I believe it is a grave of some poor little nigger," denied Eleanor, stubbornly. "But I'll consent, Nancy—and never forgive myself afterwards, if we find——" she did not finish—the thought was too dreadful for utterance.

"We won't," cheered Nancy, optimistically, "you know, if they did open a grave to bury the treasure, they'd not go far—just deep enough to hide it well; they wouldn't begin to reach as far down as the—coffin."

Eleanor shuddered at the word, but she visibly brightened at Nancy's assurance. "Though I don't believe Uncle Talcott would have done such a thing," she declared, loyally. "He wouldn't have disturbed the resting-place of the dead, even of a poor little slave child. But, Nancy, if we don't find the gold this time, I'm going to quit searching for good—it's useless and foolish to waste our time in such hopeless work. And you are going to be married, right away, and leave me with Uncle Bahama and Aunt Daphne. There's a public school a few miles from here, where the tenants send their children; maybe I can teach it, and make a living that way."

"You couldn't stand an examination, honey-child," objected Nancy; "teachers have to submit to an examination, these days. You don't know enough about text-books to train the young idea to shoot worth a cent—and they wouldn't want to learn shorthand, but a b a b s, you know."

"That is true," agreed Eleanor, soberly, "but I could study, you know, and fit myself for the examination—it won't be hard. And maybe somebody will want to learn shorthand and book-keeping. I think it will be a fine idea to teach a regular business-course, in connection with the school."

"There isn't a dozen children in these woods," objected Nancy, stoutly, "and they are not wanting a busine course, I tell you! It's nonsense—sheer nonsense, to think of such a thing. If we don't find the gold you're going back with me, that's what you're going to do, young lady!" But Eleanor shook her head, with a pitiful little smile, that made Nancy's heart ache, for she knew that Eleanor would never leave her old, dilapidated shell of a home so long as she could keep starvation away from her doors—and the mule, though ancient and averse to labor, could be depended upon to cultivate corn enough for bread, while Daphne could raise a few chickens, and maybe they could manage to purchase a pig, for meat. She could only pray fervently that David Muir's "hunch" was correct—that they'd find the buried treasure instead of buried—bones!

Daphne and Bahama sat up late, always, for the aged require little sleep, and they loved to doze over their handful of fire, these two; Bahama smoking his corn-cob pipe, and Daphne comfortably knitting coarse yarn stockings for herself and her spouse; for knitting is work that does not require a good light and young eyes for its performance—Daphne could knit and dream and doze in the shadows with perfect ease.

It seemed to Nancy, impatient to be at work, that the light in the little house in the back yard would never go out; time and again she tiptoed cautiously out, to peer in at the uncurtained window and watch the old negroes, seated beside their hearth.

At last, just as the old clock on the mantel wheezed out twelve solemn strokes, Nancy saw, to her great relief, that old Bahama had banked the fire—the cabin was dark, therefore the old folks had gone to bed at last.

"Now, honey," exulted Nancy, as she came tiptoeing back to their own room, where Eleanor, wide-eyed and pale, waited tensely, "the coast is clear—we can get about our work and dig for gold at last!"

"And if we don't find it, this is the end," declared Eleanor, solemnly; "I'll never have the heart to search another day—it will be a sign that there is no use."

"All right," agreed Nancy, hastily, "I heartily approve your decision! Now hurry and let's be about our task—I have my flashlight, which will be quite enough with the moon, which is as bright as day outside."

Shivering, though the night was balmy, the two girls stole softly forth; in the tool-house they found a shovel and a spade, which Nancy boldly shouldered, though inwardly she quaked at the gruesome thought of the use for which she intended them. Eleanor offered to help, but Nancy refused to allow her to handle them—her turn would come later, she declared, when the two of them would be necessary for digging open the—mound. Eleanor could take the flashlight, to show the way.

But no flashlight was needed, for the moon's silver rays bathed everything in their weird, supernal light, making the trees and flower-bushes, and everyday objects seem mysterious beings whose shadowy arms waited to clutch them, when they should enter their enclosure.

A mocking-bird in a rosebush beside the gate raised its voice in a flood of nocturnal melody as Nancy laid her hand upon the latch; Eleanor gave a little sob of terror, and the brave Nancy involuntarily gasped, before she came to a realizing sense of the sound, and its nature.

"Sweet, isn't it?" she asked, cheerfully, but shakily. "I always love to hear birds at night, don't you?"

"Oh, my God, Nancy!" groaned poor Eleanor, with trembling lips, "I am frightened—let us go back—please, Nancy!"

"Bosh!" scoffed Nancy, "never! Not for a bird—Oh, my goodness gracious! What—it's just a rabbit, Eleanor, a little, harmless rabbit that we've scared from his bed. Don't you see him?"

Plainly Eleanor saw the brown bit of fur, as it scampered away from the grass on the grave where it nestled, but when she controlled her voice sufficiently to speak, it was to declare, with hysterical firmness, that if another single thing disturbed them she would take it as a warning that their purpose was unholy, and go straight back to the house—she would not touch the grave! Not even if it hid untold wealth!

"Very well," agreed Nancy, resignedly, "if another thing—bug, beetle, frog or katydid dares utter a cheep, I'll go back!"

And, before a wandering beetle had a chance to whirr, heavy-winged, in the light of the moon, or a frog, hopping, wide-eyed, in the shadows to gulp down unwary insects that were awake, had time to utter a single croak; or even the katydids, sleeping in the treetops, momentarily quiet, could shrill their almost ceaseless tale of Katy's doings, Nancy boldly sent her spade crashing into the soft earth—newly mounded by old Bahama, a few weeks before, and still untouched by rain, for it had been unusually dry weather, and the shadow of the great tree protected it alike from the heat of the sun or the violence of storms.

Eleanor, seeing Nancy at work, tremblingly seized her own shovel, and clattered it with unused hand into the soft mound, biting her lips to keep from uttering a cry of terror as she did so.

It was ghastly—there was no doubt about it; but, now that they were busy, there was no time to heed the sights and sounds of the night—rabbits might scurry by, or birds sing, Eleanor's and Nancy's ears were deaf to them, hearing only the thud of the soft earth as they turned it up.

"We've got to put it back carefully, so that Bahama won't know," panted Nancy, as Eleanor's spade scattered the clay too broadly. "We'll sweep it up—he'll never notice a thing."

Soft odors from a night-blooming jasmine bush, disturbed by Nancy's vigorous spade, enveloped them in a sweet-scented shower; the great, mossy arms of the live-oaks seemed raised in horrified protest, the long moss waving in a soft breeze, trembled through the shrubs and trees with soft, palpitating breath, and in straight rows the white tombs of the sleepers looked coldly upon the unhallowed work of their descendant—the child who should protect their resting-places!

All this Eleanor thought, as, for a brief moment, she stopped panting from exhaustion, and gazed about her at the tranquil scene, bathed in the silver flood of moonlight. Then seizing the shovel, she doggedly attacked the earth once more—it would not do to stop and think!

Steadily they worked, piling the clay to one side, that they might the more easily replace it; Eleanor's strokes were shakily ineffectual, for her hands trembled so that the shovel wabbled impotently in the earth, spilling each load before it could be emptied, but Nancy's capable hands held the spade with sureness, and she worked with swiftness, eager for the task to be ended; for Nancy, too, was beginning to feel hysterical—if she didn't find something, and find it quickly, Nancy felt a deadly certainty that she would scream!

"And frighten Eleanor to death," she thought, as she pitched aside her spadeful of mold, "hold yourself tight, Nancy Dare—you've got to!

Mercifully it was soon to be over. Just as Nancy felt that she could not stand it another minute, and as poor Eleanor had to grip her shovel with hands that were now shaking wildly, while her lips had to fairly bite in the cry of horror that kept struggling to issue from them, Nancy, driven with a straight, terror-driven plunge downward, felt her spade strike something that was not earth!

Something dull, and heavy, and altogether horrible; the thud of the spade as it clattered from her nerveless hands smote upon Eleanor's startled ears, and she looked up to see Nancy, the doughty, leaning palely against the bole of the big live-oak.

"What is it?" asked Eleanor's stiff lips, the words barely inaudible. "Oh, Nancy, what is it?"

Nancy, roused by the sound of the smitten voice, felt once more the tide of life flowing briskly through her veins—she must remember Eleanor, and not be a coward!

She stopped, seized her spade and lifted it to plunge once more into the yawning opening—it really was only about a foot, but it seemed a veritable well to Nancy's excited fancy!

"Eleanor," said Nancy, and it seemed that her voice, in its uncontrolled shrilliness, must surely arouse any living thing—"Eleanor, I've reached—something!"

BLACK EYES, Wagoner, Okla.—A good rule to follow is that a boy need not remove his hat when with a girl at the counter of an ice cream "parlor." Should the couple seat themselves, however, at a table and be served there, it is correct and best that the boy should remove his hat. (2) A girl should not be obliged to tell a caller or an escort when to leave. Should he remain an inconvenient or improper length of time, she should use some simple hint or excuse to obtain his departure.

DOROTHY F., Bayswater, Va.—No; it is best that a couple should not enter church arm in arm. (2) You may, if you wish, invite your escort into your home upon your return from any entertainment. Upon his leaving, you may say: "You have been very kind and I have had a most pleasant evening." Add a smile to this as if you were glad to show you were grateful and happy for your good time. (3) If you are asked to go automobiling, you may accept by saying: "Thank you, I shall be delighted to go." That is, if you are sure your parents have no objection to your prompt acceptance of the offered ride.

M. C., Success, Ark.—The wedding ring is placed upon the bride's finger by the groom at a certain time during the ceremony. You will find this time indicated by the words of the marriage service.

PERPLEXED, Sellersville, Pa.—It is natural and proper that you should be grateful to anyone who offers sympathy or comfort to you in your bereavement.

FOOLISH COUNTRY WIFE, Ky.—We do not think this friend of your husband meant any particular harm by his familiarity—or perhaps we should say "over-friendliness." We believe it was best that you took no notice of his action if it was but the single incident you mention—and restricted to this only.

E. T., Triplett, Ky.—In entering your own home with a party of friends, it is your place to lead the way. (2) A girl of fourteen should worry but very slightly about her wardrobe, and should wear such simple school frocks as her mother may make or select for her. Of course your skirts are not yet lengthened. Do not try to grow up too fast.

VICTORIA, Newport News, Va.—The right remains with the lady to indicate when she wishes to leave a lunch room or ice cream "parlor" with her escort. A man need not necessarily wait her show of pleasure, however, and may suggest an earlier departure should he think best.

B. Z., Montery, Minn.—Getting a letter with the stamp "crossways" in the corner may simply indicate that the mind of the person who placed it in this manner was "crossways" or something worse. It might also be an attempt at some expression in the so-called "stamp language"—which is a very foolish language which we refuse to interpret and which only makes difficulty for the overworked clerks of Uncle Sam's P. O. Department. Anything that need be said by a letter should be said inside of it and not by placing stamps zigzag or upside down upon an envelope.

A MUSIC LOVER, Marshall, N. C.—It is best and proper that you refuse to accept these marked demonstrations of affection from your older cousin. What do your parents think of this?

TWO COUNTRY GIRLS, Giddings, Tex.—The correct way would be to let the boy enter the ice cream "parlor" first and choose the table, and aid you in getting seated. It is permissible for you to tell your escort, however, where you prefer to sit, or ask him to change the table he has chosen if, for any reason, it does not please you. (2) It would not be best for the boy to thank you under the circumstances you mention.

C. A. C., Shipley, Ky.—We cannot tell you how to "act" when with a girl. Briefly stated, you should act like a gentleman, and endeavor to treat the girl you are with in the same manner as you would wish to have some other boy act toward your own sister. In leaving a girl and her parents after you have escorted her home, it is sufficient for you to shake hands and say "Good night." (2) If you call on a girl and she is not at home, you may chat for a few moments with her parents, and when you leave say that you have been very sorry to miss Mary, Helen, Jane—or whatever her name may be.

L. B., Grantsboro, N. C.—Even though it may be well understood that the groom's family are to be present at this wedding, it would be well to go to the formality of sending invitations. In all cases, wedding invitations should, if possible, be mailed two weeks before the ceremony.

S. S., Tallulah Falls, Ga.—You would not have to ask all these foolish questions if you had not started in by writing to a boy you had never seen. You should not have done this nor sent him your photograph. We are certain that he used bad judgment in choosing the picture he sent in exchange for yours. That there were two other girls in this picture has nothing to do with the matter of his caring for you, but what does matter is that he has never seen you yet. You can hardly expect him to fall in love with pen and ink and a photograph. Men are generally much harder to win than that. It is not worth while demanding your letters and picture back, but do not be so foolish in the future.

BROWN EYES, Penn.—We do not see how you can be sure this young man loves you when he does not answer your letter—and you know for certain that he has received it. You say that you have heard he is "ashamed" not to have replied before. Our advice is to most assuredly not write to him again, but to let him keep on being "ashamed." And then, if he does not finally reply, it will be your part to look out for some other young man who has less shame and better manners.

DOLLY DIMPLES, Clovis, N. Mex.—You may thank the young man for bringing you home, and tell him that you have had a most enjoyable evening. (2) A young man, who is escorting a girl at night, may offer his arm should the walking become difficult or dangerous.

RUSTIC, Guyton, Ga.—Yes, a girl of twenty may receive attentions from a boy of eighteen and many happy marriages have occurred where the husband has been younger than the wife. It is much better, however, that these age conditions be reversed, and we advise you to look for a suitor older than the boy you mention. (2) No, it would not be best to give a pair of gold cuff links as a birthday gift to a boy. Nothing but the most simple presents should be exchanged between any couple who are not engaged.

PANSY, Hoboken, Ga.—In entering a church where there are ushers, a girl may follow the usher and precede her escort down the aisle. Where there are no ushers, it would generally be best for the man to lead the way. (2) It is better that the boy should go ahead. See answer to "Two Country Girls" in this column.

BLUE AND BROWN EYES, Howe, Tex.—You must not go to a dance ten miles from your home unless you are chaperoned. And, if your mother is willing that you should run about in this manner, we think there are some very foolish parents in Howe. A fifteen-year-old girl should not be going to dances and automobiling at night. (2) A girl should not marry at seventeen. She should wait three years—and then not marry a man eighteen years older than herself if there is a younger one she loves better. It seems to be easy for you to "love dearly." We wonder how much affection you lavish on your school books? Stick to these for a while yet, and leave marriage for a later and wiser day.

L. D., Erick, Okla.—A girl should not receive any serious attentions from young men until she has finished her schooling. From the spelling of your letter, we believe you have some time yet to keep for your books and not for boys. (2) A girl should not cheapen herself by allowing any man to kiss her whom she has not promised to marry.

E. H., Paha, Wash.—It is a discouraging situation when you have to say "he never did love me as I did him." And it is also not encouraging that he left you once for another girl. However, if you still want to bother with him, why let him write you as he has requested—but we fear you are wasting time.

V. O., Grinnell, Ia.—The names need not be mentioned but once in an introduction. But effort should be made to speak distinctly. (2) Yes, you may acknowledge an introduction in the way you have mentioned. Try and use the name of your new acquaintance, however. Avoid stiffness and set forms.

E. K., Neb.—Yes, you may stop for a moment and talk to this boy when you meet him on the street. It would be permissible for you to suggest his calling to see you, and it would be better, under the circumstances of your home, for you to mention a day when it might be most convenient for you to see him. Do not be unhappy and consider yourself lonesome and unfortunate. You say that you are nineteen and "good looking." These are two things to be thankful for—and they should prevent your feeling discontented—or lonely.

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MISS L. O., Harrisville, Texas.—Would advise you to take some tonic such as Basham's Mixture, in tablespoonful doses, after meals. A tonic of this kind will build you up physically, and, no doubt, help develop the bust. Gently, also, massage the bust, using cocoa-butter as a lubricant for the hand when massaging the busts.

MRS. L. H., Charles City, Ia.—Try Lassar's Paste. Reduce the strength one half or more by the use of vaseline. Apply to the hands at bedtime only. Keep your hands from soap and water so far as possible. To cleanse the hands, use cold cream.

MISS M. J., Opelousas, La.—You probably have an ulcer of the stomach. A very simple diet is indicated—such as skimmed milk, simple cereals, plenty of water, and possibly a lavage of the stomach. If your condition becomes worse after using care and proper diet, an operation is indicated. Dobell's solution, as a local wash, will relieve the itching around the rectum. Use frequently and keep the parts thoroughly cleansed, also bowels free.

MR. M. L. H., Marlow, Okla.—COMFORT publishes no medical treatise on medicine. It tries to answer all communications intelligently.

MRS. W. H. P., Parlewville, Miss.—You no doubt were very unwise to attempt walking so soon after typhoid fever. Try an iron tonic after meals—such as diallylized iron in half-teaspoonful doses, well diluted.

MISSES M. AND W., Danville, Va.—After syringing out the ear, apply to the canal or sore spot an ammoniated mercury ointment; this ointment can be obtained at any good drug store.

COOL, N. C., Cooleemee, N. C.—You have catarrh of the tube running from the middle ear to the throat. Have this properly treated and this symptom will disappear. For the lump in the throat use five-grain assafœtida pills—one after meals.

MRS. I. L. G., Glenwar, Va.—Apply to the freckles a weak solution of corrosive sublimate—1 to 10,000 solution. Apply at night. You will have to consult your local doctor as to the other trouble.

MRS. H. G. G., Clarksburg, West Va.—Adhesions form almost immediately after an operation. Adhesions are caused by inflammatory exudates thrown out to heal the wound caused by operation. Grown people can have almost anything, even worms! Try, for the worms, some one-half santonine and calomel tablets. Three a day for two days. Follow this with a large dose of castor oil.

MISS E. T., Rolling Hill, Va.—Have the "red spots" treated by electricity. This is the only way to cure them.

MR. J. H. H., Taylor, Ga.—You have ulcer of the stomach. Try 1-100 grain doses of atropine sulphate, two or three times a day. This remedy, of course, can only be used on the advice and prescription of your local doctor.

MISS A. S., Alpena, Mich.—Use for the dandruff, a two per cent resorcin solution. The solution should be made in half alcohol and half rose water. Apply at night to the roots of the hair.

MRS. L. A., Lynnville, Ky.—Your child died from meningitis no doubt following the "flu." The glycerine suppositories had nothing to do with the case and you handled the child intelligently and all right.

MRS. H. K., West Plains, Mo.—Cannot state cause; but have your physician try corpus luteum extract, and see what that will do for your condition of arrest of development of bust.

MRS. W. E. C., Nathalie, Va.—Cannot suggest any remedy for the trouble mentioned.

MRS. L. K., Magnolia, Ark.—There is no elixir of life; but if there were you should certainly have it. The best thing we can suggest is a tonic such as the compound tincture of cinchona. Take a teaspoonful after meals. This may brace you up. You might also take a teaspoonful of American Oil with your meals to help your constipation and lubricate the intestinal tract.

MRS. P. A. COPELAND, Montery Farm, Tenn.—Just massage the non-growing breast, using cocoa butter as a lubricant, and await results.

MRS. J. W. E., Lyons, Ind.—The trouble is temper. Just forget it and time will cure him of his disposition.

MR. G. W. A., Petersburg, West Va.—None whatever. They are all frauds.

MRS. H. M., Hailwood, Pa.—Better have her adenoids and tonsils removed and see what that will do toward developing the girl's mouth and throat.

MISS H., Bellport, L. I.—You are eating too much and taking too little exercise.

MRS. V. M., Walker Springs, Ala.—You have malaria, no doubt. You should take some calomel in small doses, and follow this with tr. eupatorium, in teaspoonful doses, after meals. There is no relation between this condition and the painful coitus mentioned.

MRS. S. G., Elizabethtown, Ky.—Don't think you have hook-worm trouble; but you have a long-standing intestinal trouble—water-logged condition with the sloughing off of portions of the mucous membrane from time to time. A carefully selected diet, use of American oil in small doses with your meals, and some small doses of calomel and soda will help, if not cure you. The doses of calomel and soda should be about one-tenth grain calomel and one grain soda. Take these tablets three times a day between meals, for one week only. High-up saline enemas would also help you. These can only be given by a nurse.

MRS. M. Y., Sulphur Springs.—There is only one answer to your question. Cataracts cannot be removed without operation, and any one who advises you differently is a charlatan.

MRS. B. B. D., Holland, Texas.—This is probably a mild form of epilepsy. You should limit the diet, and moderate rapidity of eating food, at all times. You should also have the child examined for adenoids, etc.

MRS. C. F. R., Return, Va.—Use a mouth wash and gargle with Dobell's solution three or four times a day. Also have your teeth looked after.

J. J. R., Coal Hill, Ark.—It is rheumatism, no doubt. Probably coal-mining does not agree with you and you may have to adopt some other occupation. Also the water you drink may have something to do with your condition. Look into these things and decide for yourself.

MRS. M. S., Shumer, Texas.—You have acute indigestion. Try American Oil—a teaspoonful with your meals.

MISS B. B., Corydon, Ia.—Thyroid extract has been advised to reduce fat, combined with corpus luteum ampules containing five-grain doses. Of course, this treatment must be combined with a suitable diet. Starchy foods must be taboo always, and any other foods that are flesh making.

MRS. B. D., Greensboro, N. C.—You may have polyps in the nose. These must be removed by an operation. This may relieve your entire trouble.

MISS D. H., Las Aminas, Cal.—There are many varieties of goitres, so-called. You might try ovarian extract, in tablet form, under the advice of your family doctor.

You'll Have a Complexion To Rave Over!"

A Way That Never Fails to Produce Wonderful Results in a Few Days on the Complexion and the Hair.

Simple Methods of Beauty Making That Never Fail. Any Woman Can Now Be Beautiful.

By Madame Maree

NOTE—The articles mentioned herein have come into such demand because of their effectiveness that you can obtain them at any drug store. But if your druggist cannot supply you, arrangements have been made to send any of these articles by mail, charges paid, on receipt of price, by addressing "Secretary to Madame Maree, 582 Thompson Building, Chicago.

A Lily Skin in a Few Days

THERE is but one thing you need to beautify your skin and bring it to a condition of incomparable loveliness in a short time. This has been used by thousands of women with extraordinary success. By the use of this you will soon find that all red spots, freckles, all muddiness and sallowness will have disappeared completely, leaving the skin pure and clear as a lily. You cannot get this result except by mixing yourself at home, in a very few moments, one ounce of zintone with a little glycerine and hot water. The zintone costs fifty cents at the drug store. This makes a remarkable cream, which, when used liberally, will not fail to give you the results.

Hair Stops Falling, and Grows

You can easily prevent hair from falling, and you can make it grow thick and luxuriant by a very simple method, which is far superior in results to that of any so-called hair tonic you can buy. You will notice the difference in your hair in a very few days, and it will take on a vigorous lustre besides, and thin spots will at once begin to fill with new hair. This is done by simply adding one ounce of beta-quinol to a half pint of water and a half pint of bay rum. If you prefer you may use a full pint of witchhazel instead of the water and bay rum. The beta-quinol may be procured for fifty cents at any drug store. Try this and you will no longer find handfuls of hair coming out on your comb and brush; and your hair will be the envy of all your friends.

A Sure Way to Remove Wrinkles

It is really inspiring to know that removing wrinkles now depends almost entirely upon yourself. Just a few minutes' trouble at the start, and more than half the battle is over. It will take but a few moments for you to make a mixture of two ounces of eptol, a little water and glycerine. The eptol can be obtained from your druggist for fifty cents. This cream produces startling changes in the skin in a short time. It renders the skin plump and youthful, very girlish, and the result is that wrinkles fill out and disappear. It will make you look many years younger if you will only use it faithfully.

Secret About Washing Hair

Every scalp has constantly forming on it a thin, invisible film of fatty accumulations which soap cannot remove, not even with hard rubbing. The one way to remove this film, and let your hair breathe is to dissolve it. This is done by the use of a teaspoonful of eggol dissolved in a half cup of hot water, and used as a shampoo and head-wash. This unseals the pores, and it will surprise you what a tremendous difference it produces in the appearance and growth of the hair. There is no more luxurious head-wash possible, and it is, besides, very economical. In a twenty-five cent package of eggol, which can be secured at any drug store, there is enough to supply you with over a dozen of these shampoos.

To Remove Superfluous Hair

There is a very remarkable way to remove superfluous hair. This is becoming exceedingly popular, because it is as easy and pleasing to use as a face lotion, and dissolves away the hair instead of burning it off as many other depilatories do. Simply moisten the hairs with a little sulfo solution. The hairs begin to shrivel. You can see them dissolve, and then with just a swish of the finger, all the hairs can be rubbed off clear and clean. It leaves the skin thoroughly free from all superfluous hairs, not leaving even a suggestion that you had any superfluous hairs at all. It is glorious. Every woman should have some sulfo solution on her dresser. It will cost one dollar at any drug store, and will last for a considerable time.

Blackheads Go in a Few Minutes

It is only a question of a few moments to get rid of blackheads. The only thing that will do this is neroxin. You sprinkle a little neroxin on a wet cloth or sponge and rub the blackheads with this for a few moments. Looking in your mirror, you will find the blackheads gone. This is a very remarkable article, and you need no longer use tonics, face-steaming, and pinching, and other useless methods for many months at a time. For fifty cents you can get the neroxin from your druggist.

THE WILSON CHEMICAL CO., BIG CASH COMMISSION TO AGENTS Dept. L. 112, Tyrone, Pa.

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MRS. M. B., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that children or grandchildren can be legally disinherited by will, provided the testator possesses testamentary capacity, and provided no undue influence is exercised upon him, and provided the will is legally drawn and executed and expresses the testator's true intent.

E. A., South Carolina.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the essentials of a valid will are that the testator shall possess testamentary capacity, that no undue influence is exercised upon him and that the will is legally drawn and executed, it should be signed by the testator and by at least three witnesses, who should be present at the time the testator signs the will and who should sign in his presence and in the presence of each other; we think in the case you describe and upon your statements, the husband and wife should execute separate wills leaving their property to each other; we do not think the property need be itemized in such wills but could be transferred by a general clause disposing of all the property, both personal and real; we think it would be best for each to appoint the other as sole executor; no bonds should be required and a direction to that effect should be made in each of the wills; we do not think it will be necessary to change the manner of registration of your Liberty Bonds as your widow will as your executrix be able to collect all of the assets of your estate.

MRS. L. D. C., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, that upon the death of your husband, leaving no will, and leaving no child or descendant, you will be entitled to receive from his estate all personal property which came to your husband in right of the marriage, and also one half of the real and personal estate of which he was the owner at the time of his death, provided you make and record a properly written election that you are willing to take such property subject to the payment of your husband's debts; we think if you are named as beneficiary in your husband's life insurance policy, the insurance money will be paid direct to you and will not be subject to his debts; we think if he desires to have you receive his whole estate, he should make and execute a will to that effect.

E. M. T., Montana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the consent of the parents is necessary for the adoption of their minor child, unless it can be conclusively shown by proper evidence that such parents are not proper persons to have the custody of such child.

E. V. F. S., Minnesota.—We do not think the man you mention had any legal right to build his house on another man's land without any permission or lease from the owner of the land; we do not think he can compel the owner of the land to sell the land to him, nor can he enforce any rights in the land as against the owner of same.

MRS. W. S. W., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all real and personal property owned by the wife at the time of her marriage, together with all acquired thereafter by gift, devise or descent, as also the increase of all such lands, remain her separate property, and she is legally entitled to the management and control of the same, except that she cannot transfer the same without the signature of the husband. We think if your husband's parents refuse to pay rent or move from your property, it will be necessary for you to bring a court proceeding against them to enforce your rights.

W. O. B., Connecticut.—A quit claim deed is a deed of conveyance operating by way of release; that is intended to pass any title, interest or claim which the grantor may have in the premises, but not professing that such title is valid, nor containing any warranty or covenants for title.

MRS. L. E. K. W., Kansas.—We do not think the statute of limitations would run against the crime of rape during the time the defendant absented himself from the state. Your statements would indicate that the charge against the man you mention may be a bastardy charge and not rape. We think a bastardy proceeding is oftentimes brought in such a case as you describe for the support of the child, and is much less serious than a charge of rape.

A. N., Pennsylvania.—We think your only recourse against the man, who purchased your horses, for the money he still owes you, would be an action against him to enforce payment of same; if he has left this country and has no property here, it will be difficult for you to recover your money from him.

S. W. B., Kansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a real estate agent would be entitled to recover his commission from you upon your refusal to carry out your agreement for the sale of your property, after he has procured a purchaser willing and able to buy upon the terms specified by you in your employment of the real estate agent; we do not think he would be entitled to recover if the purchaser was unwilling or unable to carry out the terms except in some changed form from those embraced in the agent's employment.

MRS. W. H., California.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of the wife the entire community property, without administration, belongs to the surviving husband, except such portion as may have been set apart to her by judicial decree for her support and maintenance, such portion going under the terms of her will, and in the absence of a will goes to her heirs exclusive of her husband; upon the death of the husband one half of the community property goes to the wife and the other half is subject to the testamentary disposition of the husband and in the absence of such disposition goes to his descendants; divorce of parents does not affect inheritance rights of the children; step-children have no intestacy rights from step-parents.

MRS. E. P., Montana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that homesteads not to exceed in value the sum of $2,500, and if agricultural land not to exceed 160 acres, are exempt from levy under execution to a married man who is the head of a family.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

L. I. S., Madrid, Ia.—A girl is legally of age at eighteen in your state and could marry at that time without her parents' consent—if she were so foolish as to wish to do this.

O. T., Spencer, La.—It is true that General Pershing taught school in Missouri many years ago. We have never understood that this was a negro school. (2) You should not send a simple question concerning your state government to this department. You could gain this information at once from the clerk of the Louisiana parish in which your town is located.

MRS. F. D., Greenfield, Mo.—There were but 147 acres of vacant public land in your state on July 1, 1918. In Nebraska there are over 105,000 acres yet vacant. You could learn regarding this by addressing the U. S. Land Office at Lincoln, Nebraska, where H. A. Meier serves as Register. In Oklahoma—where over 30,000 acres are yet unoccupied—you should write to J. Y. Callahan, who is Register of the U. S. Land Office at Guthrie, Okla.

R. F., Maplesville, Ala.—We believe bookkeeping to be a subject which could be more easily taught by mail than could nursing. You must remember that to profit by instruction in either of these two modes of breadwinning, at least a grammar school education would be needed. Your letter does not mention your age nor your previous education, but your spelling would indicate that your schooling was as yet rather elementary. Perhaps you had best pursue this further before you take up specialized and more ambitious subjects.

L. K., Kingsport, Tenn.—The inscription in your violin was placed there to indicate that it was the handiwork of Jacob Stainer of the town of Absam in the Tyrol. Stainer was a follower of the Amati School of violin makers and adapted their methods to the higher models of the Cremona instruments. A genuine Stainer violin is of undoubted value, but you must remember—as this department has often pointed out—that there are a great many fraudulent imitations of the work of the old violin masters, and the inscription in your instrument does not necessarily mean that it was made by Jacob Stainer over two centuries ago.

O. B., Holstein, Ia.—There are no vacant public lands in Virginia and only a few score acres in Missouri. Arkansas has over 200,000 acres still open, and Oklahoma about 30,000. Of the two states we would give the preference to Arkansas as offering the best opportunities for homesteading. Write to J. W. Allen, Register of U. S. Land Office, Little Rock, Ark., and to J. Y. Callahan, who has charge of the Land Office at Guthrie, Okla. But we believe that one can make as much money on a farm in Iowa as he can in any other state, and we advise you to consider seriously before you give up old ties and settle yourself in new lands under strange conditions.

M. M., Missouri.—No; it would be impossible for you to obtain any portion of your dead fiance's estate unless he left a will in which a bequest was made in your favor.

MRS. W. M. M., Tulot, Ark.—Nowadays, almost every large town or city contains some firm or individual with machinery for converting old carpets into rugs by a shredding and re-weaving process. We feel very sure that you could get this work done in your own city of Little Rock. Search the advertising columns of the Little Rock newspapers. Or write to the Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce there for information. If you fail to succeed, we will be glad to help you further.

V. F., Bee Ridge, Fla.—A wood-cut published in the year 1700 shows the Old London Bridge to have been built of timber. Three-story houses, furnishing homes for many persons, covered the entire structure. The timber used in the structure is said to have been piles of elm which were bolted together by thick planks into piers twenty-five feet and more in thickness. The bridge was 336 feet long and two thirds of this distance was taken up by piers. Many fires constantly occurred among the houses built on the bridge and these together with the decay of the foundation timbers, accounted for the eventual removal of the falling structure. The modern stone structure now known as London Bridge was opened to the public in 1831.

J. W., Washington, N. C.—There are over 3,000,000 acres of public lands yet open for allotment in the big state of Montana. Necessarily, a great deal of this land is not adapted to farming. Write to F. T. Woods, who is Register of the U. S. Land Office at Billings, Montana, for full information regarding homesteading.

H. L. P., Osser, Minn.—A carnelian is a semi-precious stone and is of no great value. If you have one you wish to sell, you should look for your market among jewelers. There would be no commercial demand for the home-made paper beads you mention. You would have to dispose of them direct, either by a house-to-house canvass or by advertsing in newspaper columns.

MRS. G. R., Winamac, Ind.—A fertile section of New Jersey is the Kittatinny Valley, which is about ten miles wide and lies between the Highland Range and the Kittatinny Mountains. But the whole central part of this fortunate state is a great market garden for the supplying of New York and Philadelphia. There is considerable clay land in New Jersey, but the greater part of the soil is a sandy loam, some of which is light in character but well adapted to market gardening. Tobacco is not a product of the state.

MRS. E. S. B., Poca, W. Va.—No one can give an estimate of the value of a diamond or other precious stone without a close examination of the gem under a microscope. There should be no need of your sending to Washington to obtain such appraisal, which could be made for you by any good local jeweler. If you mean to ask if any free valuation of precious stones is made by the Federal Government, we can assure you that such is not the case.

This free trial is not to cost me one penny, and if I like the glasses and keep them, I am to pay you $1.95 only—no more and no less. But if, for any reason whatsoever, I don't wish to keep them (and I, myself, am to be the sole judge), I will return them to you without paying you a single cent for them, as you agreed in the above advertisement to send them on ten days' absolute free trial. With this understanding I mail you this certificate, and it is agreed that you will stick to your word and I will stick to mine. Don't fail to answer the following questions:

How old are you?.....How many years have you used glasses (if any)?.....

How Many Words Can You Make

Now here is a puzzle that is a prize winner. You do not have to set up and work over a dictionary all night. Just a little ingenuity and skill. The puzzle is to get as many words as possible out of the letters herewith given. Use only the letters given and only as many times as they appear. For instance, the letter R appears four times, so in all your words you must not use it more than four times. If you use R twice in one word and twice in another, you cannot use R in another word, as you have already used it as many times as it appears. You do not have to use up all the letters. No foreign words or proper names may be used. Websters Revised Unabriged Dictionary will be the Standard used in determining the validity of any word. The puzzle looks simple, but if you can make as many as twelve words, send in your list at once as the person winning first prize may not have more than that many words.

WHY WE DO IT

We publish the best story paper in America, and we want to send you a sample copy and full particulars of our big contest club.

It does not cost you a cent to become a Club Member and every new member this month receives A Genuine Diamond Ring FREE.

THE OFFER

We are conducting a big prize contest and will give 100 votes in the contest for each word you make. Just as soon as you become a Club Member you will receive a Genuine Diamond Ring and extra votes. To the person having the most votes at the end of the contest we will give $25 in cash; to the second highest $10; to the third highest $7.50; to the fourth $5 and to the fifth $2.50. In addition we are going to give away hundreds of other valuable prizes too numerous to mention in this advertisement. Contest closes Jan. 20th, 1920. Anyone may enter and if you only win the $2.50 prize you are that much ahead. It is certainly worth a little effort, and besides you will receive, absolutely free, a copy of the best story paper published. If there should be a tie between two or more contestants for any of the prizes, each tieing contestant will receive the prize tied for. Write today. WORD EDITOR, 517 Friend Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

Is Your Blood Starving for Lack of Iron?

Modern Methods of Cooking and Living Have Made an Alarming Increase in Iron Deficiency in Blood of American Men and Women

WHY NUXATED IRON SO QUICKLY BUILDS UP WEAK, NERVOUS, RUN-DOWN FOLKS — Over 3,000,000 People Annually Taking It In This Country Alone To Increase Their Strength, Power, Energy and Endurance.

"Is your blood starving for want of iron? Iron is red blood food. If you were to go without eating until you became weak, thin and emaciated, you could not do a more serious harm to yourself than when you let your blood literally starve for want of iron—iron that gives strength and power to change food into living tissue," says Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.), New York and the Westchester County Hospital.

"Modern methods of cooking and the rapid pace at which people of this country live has made such an alarming increase in iron deficiency in the blood of American men and women that I have often marveled at the large number of people who lack iron in the blood, and who never suspect the cause of their weak, nervous run-down state. Lack of iron in the blood not only makes a man a physical and mental weakling, nervous, irritable, easily fatigued, but it utterly robs him of that virile force, that stamina and strength of will which are so necessary to success and power in every walk of life. It may also transform a beautiful, sweet-tempered woman into one who is cross, nervous and irritable. Without iron in your blood your food merely passes through the body, something like corn through an old mill with rollers so wide apart that the mill can't grind.

"For want of iron you may be an old man at thirty, dull of intellect, poor in memory, nervous, irritable and all 'run-down,' while at 50 or 60 with plenty of iron in your blood you may still be young in feeling, full of life, you whole being brimming over with vim and energy.

"But in my opinion you can't make strong, keen, forceful men and healthy rosy-cheeked women by feeding them on metallic iron. The old forms of metallic iron must go through a digestive process to transform them into organic iron—Nuxated Iron—before they are ready to be taken up and assimilated by the human system. Notwithstanding all that has been said and written on this subject by well-known physicians, thousands of people still insist in dosing themselves with metalic iron simply, I suppose, because it costs a few cents less. I strongly advise readers in all cases to get a physician's prescription for organic iron—Nuxated Iron—or if you don't want to go to this trouble, then purchase only Nuxated Iron in its original packages and see that this particular name (Nuxated Iron) appears on the package."

In commenting upon the value of Nuxated Iron as a means for creating red blood, strength and endurance, Dr. Ferdinand King, a New York Physician and Medical Author says:

"Scarcely a day goes by but that I see women whose care-worn faces, dragging steps and generally weak, tired appearance show unmistakable signs of that anæmic run-down condition usually brought on by lack of iron in the blood.

"Give such a woman a short course of Nuxated Iron and she often quickly becomes an entirely different individual—strong, healthy and rosy-cheeked. I have used Nuxated Iron widely in my own practice in most severe, aggravated conditions with unfailing results. I have induced many other physicians to give it a trial, all of whom have given me most surprising reports in regard to its great power as a health and strength builder."

MANUFACTURERS' NOTE: Nuxated Iron, which is used by Dr. Sullivan and others with such surprising results, and which is prescribed and recommended above by physicians, is not a secret remedy but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorgonic iron products, it is easily assimilated, does nt injure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser or they will refund your money. It is dispensed by all good druggists.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In writing this department always sign your true name and give your address; if not, your letter will receive no attention. Name will not be published.

MERRY Christmas, girls! Do you know why I can say that so feelingly? First of all, I suppose it is because I really mean it, and secondly (sound like a minister, don't I?) I'm not worn out and exhausted, physically and mentally, by the usual Christmas rush and scurry. My gifts were bought, or made, wrapped and gotten ready to send some months ago. That sounds as though I were a terribly smug, self-satisfied person, doesn't it, but I hope I am not. Only try it yourself next year and whenever you see something you know Aunt Matilda or Cousin Jane would like, get it and put it away until Christmas. Even your cards and booklets can be gotten ready to send, but unless your relatives and friends are the stay-put sort of people it would be better not to address them.

I wish it were possible for me to present each of my girls with gifts suitable to themselves, something dainty and frilly, but, alas, I can't buy frillies for my own self let alone several hundred girls, so please take the will for the deed and wish yourselves Merry Christmas for me.—Ed.

BLONDE, Neb.—I haven't the slightest idea whether or not it would be "polite" to knit a sleeveless sweater for your fiance as a Christmas gift but I think it would be quite proper and very suitable, particularly if Nebraska winters are anything like Maine winters. If they are, you had better knit two. Khaki or dark grey are particularly good colors.

HAPPY PEGGY, Antlers, Okla.—"What is the luckiest month in which to get married?" Nobody knows. Those who are unhappily married feel sure that no month is lucky and those that are happily married are equally certain that any month is lucky, so there you are. The only thing to do is to get married and be such a good wife that whatever month you are married is the luckiest. Best wishes.

LOVING EYES.—There is no good reason why you shouldn't marry your brother-in-law if you want to. It happens frequently in the best of families. Wait until you are old enough to know your own mind and until you have met enough other men to be sure he is the right and only one.

PEGGY, California.—Summer acquaintances aren't always lasting and if you were my daughter I'd tell you to wait and let the young man write first. If he wants to keep in touch with you he will do so. (2) If you dislike the thoughts of a business career so very much it seems unwise to go on with it. There must be something else you'd like better. I'm a firm believer in doing the work we like to do and are suited for rather than forcing ourselves to do something we don't like. Find out what we want to do and then talk it over with your father.

J. C., Texas.—If you have been engaged to a man for over a year and now he has stopped coming to see you and goes with other girls and doesn't notice you, you might sue him for breach of promise or go ahead and die of grief as you contemplate doing. Personally, I wouldn't cheapen myself by suing him for breach of promise and I certainly shouldn't die of grief over such a man as that. He isn't worth it and, besides, funerals are frightfully expensive now. Better wait a while longer. Don't go to his sister's house just to get a chance to talk with him. Haven't you any pride? You make me tired when you say if he doesn't take you back you'll die of grief. You should be the one to refuse to take him back. In a year from now you will have forgotten all about him, it's a habit eighteen has, and be ashamed of yourself for ever thinking you loved him. Wait and see if I am not right, and in the meantime just think that whatever happens is for the best even though it seems the very worst at the time.

SUSEY, Tenn.—Since the days of cave men it has been the man's undisputed privilege to declare his love for the woman of his choice (though methods differed then, I believe) and tactful indeed is the woman who can usurp that right and get away with it gracefully. I wouldn't dare attempt it. You can only wait and hope. Not a very comforting answer, is it? but you might try being nice nice (but not too nice) to him and see if that helps any.

TEDDY, Ky.—My dear girl—I can't say "little" girl because you are larger than the average girl of thirteen, but that isn't anything to feel badly over. It may be a trifle awkward just at present but you'll soon get over that. How much do you weigh? That's an important factor to consider when determining the length of your dresses. Also, I'd have to know the shape of your face and what kind and how much hair you have before I could tell you a becoming way to arrange it. Do you associate with girls your age or your size? I could advise you better if you were to send me your picture.

EDITH, Montana.—Perhaps your fiance doesn't know that the engagement ring belongs on the third finger of the left hand, but if the ring he sent was too small you shouldn't have worn it on your little finger. You should have returned it to him, by mail or in person, explaining that you wanted to wear your engagement ring on the proper finger and would he please exchange it or have it made larger. It isn't too late for the latter, even now.

HELOISE, Victor, Montana.—It is impossible for me to tell whether the boy you mention is true to you or whether he intends to marry you but I agree with your father in thinking that he should have inquired about you when you were ill. He should have sent flowers and written if he couldn't call because the disease was contagious. Neglect from a husband is too often the case but a girl should be wary of a fiance who does not show her proper attention. Your mother shouldn't expect you to wait until you are thirty before getting married. You should be married and have one or two or three children by that time.

CURLY LOCKS, Ark.—A "touchy, pouty," sweetheart must be an awful affliction, but just think how much worse it would be to have a husband of that variety, so give him to understand the next time he develops such an attack he needn't expect you to take him back when he gets over pouting. Don't flirt.

BLUE EYES, W. Va.—Haven't any knowledge of the subject you mention. Ask your family physician.

ATTINE, Ark.—No, to all your questions.

BILLY, Kans.—I can answer your first question very easily for I know that it isn't the right thing for a little girl of fourteen to correspond with a boy she has never met, or one she has met, for that matter, but really, Billy, I don't know whether it is "wrong to kiss a boy on the side street," or not. It may be all right but I never did it and I don't think you had better, any more.

I hope you aren't any more unhappy than you were, for I've tried my best to make you a tiny bit happier so that you can start the new year aright. It's so much easier to be good when you are happy, and I want you to be the very best girls in the world.

By, by, until next year.

COUSIN MARION.

ness. His wicked nature broke through its thin veneer of respectability, and he indulged in wild denunciations and horrid oaths. The faithless Jackman was heartily sick of the whole affair. The little gold cross which poor Beryl had given him for his wife, and which he had laid in a small cabinet until his wife's return, had weighed upon his soul like a cross of fire. True, he had wrought his best to bring about the evil triumph of Berdyne, for, had he not done so, he and his wife would have been cast forth, penniless, from Sunset Ranch; nevertheless, he drew a long breath of relief when he heard that the dauntless Neil had appeared on the scene, and had bravely rescued his precious Beryl out of Berdyne's very clutches.

Trenwyck's shouts, and the noise of the conflict, had drawn not only Jackman, but several of the ranch employees, to the scene. The lawyer stepped up to Berdyne, and laid a hand on his arm.

"You are merely wasting time, Nick," said he.

Berdyne tossed the hand furiously from him.

"You are a skulking coward!" he hissed, through his teeth. "Had you been half a man, Preston would not have been able to get away with the girl and the automobile."

"The fellow was a perfect whirlwind," returned Trenwyck humbly. "I will admit that I have no desire to meet him face to face; but let me have the chance to deal him a blow from behind, and I can promise you, Berdyne, that you will not be disappointed in me."

"A curse on him!" ground out Berdyne. "I shall yet lay him low, and the debt he owes me shall be fearfully repaid! That was the second time he laid his hands on me—and I could kill any man for doing less! As for the girl, what has happened merely whets my passion for her. The more difficult an object is in the attaining, the more I long for it. Hello, Jackman!" With the last words, Berdyne turned toward the house, where Jackman was standing in the light that streamed through an open door.

"What do you want?" demanded the rancher.

"I want an automobile. Get me one!" was Berdyne's vigorous answer. "We must go in pursuit of them at once."

"I haven't any," returned Jackman, "and the nearest one is six miles away. The most I can do is to give you a buggy and a pair of draft horses."

"A pursuit with race horses would be fruitless," interposed Trenwyck. "The Red Flyer is a fast car, is it not, Berdyne?"

"Yes, among the fastest in the state," was the rueful response.

"And it was equipped for a long journey?"

"I had it in readiness for the trip from here to San Francisco," growled Berdyne. "It was my purpose not to halt, after I had once started, until I had landed my prize in a safe retreat somewhere in or near the city. From there, after I had reduced the beautiful little termagant to a state of subjection, I should have taken her to a yacht which I have chartered, and which is now lying off Sausalito, or to a houseboat belonging to a friend, which, at present, is in Belvedere Cove. May the archfiend take Preston!" he added, the thought of his fine plans, and the way they had been frustrated putting fresh spur to his temper.

He picked up his revolver from the place where he had dropped it when Neil had felled him in the road. After slipping it into his hip pocket, he mechanically began dusting off his garments. His evil cunning was not long held in subjection by his tempest of anger. Implacable hate burned in his breast, together with a demoniacal desire for revenge; but, through it all, reason was gradually pushing to the fore and obtaining the mastery.

"Where will he go, do you think?" queried Trenwyck. "Will he take the girl to San Jose?"

"Never fear," was the gloomy response. "Unless I am wide of my reckoning, he will not halt until he has made the girl his bride. But even so," he added, lowering his voice, "if I cannot have the maid, I will have the widow!"

Trenwyck took fright at the grim menace of the words.

"Think well what you plan, Berdyne," he cautioned. "As your legal adviser, I warn you to beware of going too far."

"I will go any length!" snapped Nick. "I yearn for that little beauty with all my heart and soul; but, apart from that, every dollar I own in the world may hang upon my making her my wife. What Preston learned in the far North may be——"

STRIPES

"Take me in your car, Dr. Elgin," she begged. "I—I am running away. Please take me to some railroad point not on this road. I must get away tonight!"

"But he will be home tomorrow."

"Yes, tomorrow!" she echoed.

"You'd better stay for him."

"I cannot!"

"Theo, you've been hiding long enough. Can't you make up your mind to face this thing? Brace up now, and you two can face it together!"

"Dr. Elgin, he has worn stripes!"

"I will lend you two the money to go away into another State."

"God spared us children in our first union. It was a Providence and a sign. If I go back to him now there may be children, and the father of those little ones will have worn stripes."

"Very well. I will have my car ready in five minutes."

Theo said her plans were to visit a school girl friend until she could obtain work as a music teacher. I took her to Larksburg on a north and south road and returned to Pecan at sunrise.

I don't like to think of the thing I witnessed that day. Old Mr. and Mrs. Hodges were at the station wating to see their son. They had begged me to go out home with them in order to be present when the young man first learned that his wife had fled. I shall never forget the bleak look on Roy's face when he first looked over the crowd at the depot and saw that Theo was not there. Eagerness, disappointment, dismay quickly chased one another across his face.

"Where's Theo?" was his first question.

"You'll see her later," I hedged, and the next minute his little old mother had fluttered into his arms and occupied all his attention for the moment. I got him into the front seat of the surrey with me, and we four made the three-mile journey in quick time.

I walked into the house with the boy, the parents both lingering at the surrey, pretending to busy themselves with this or that.

"Theo!" he called as he walked hastily through the dining-room and glanced into every open door he passed. "Theo!"

"She isn't here!" I told him.

"Isn't here!"

"She went away last night!"

His long arm shot toward the double hooks above the kitchen door where his father's rifle lay.

"Stop!"

He drew back his hand and looked at me as though he hardly knew who I was.

"Roy!" I said, as I made an effort to fix his eyes with mine and hold his wandering attention, "you've done that girl enough harm. You've broken her heart! You've disgraced her till she is ashamed to show her face! You've aged her twenty years! And, Roy, you are the only man that can give anything back to her. You must brace up and actually do what you only pretended to do before,—become a man with a man's will and a man's honor! If you do this, boy, she will some day be proud to come back to you!"

He flung his arms aloft with a desperate gesture and cried out with the cry of a child: "Oh, I want her now!"

"There's just one way you can win her back," I urged. "I have pointed out the way."

He sank into a chair and sobbed his heart out while I stood beside him with my hand upon his shoulder.

"I will win her back!" he said solemnly after a long time.

That was early in April, 1916. Cotton had completely recovered from the slump caused by the European war and had now mounted to eighteen cents a pound. Roy Hodge did not come into Pecan after that day until July. He told me then that he had the prospect of thirty bales of cotton and at the prospective price of lint and seed he would pay back half he still owed the Ward estate that fall.

During July and August he worked in the woods getting out stave timber, and as soon as his cotton was picked and sold in the fall he began again to get out stave bolts and kept up the work until plowing time the next spring. Meanwhile both cotton and seed were both advancing in price, and he prepared for a heavy acreage.

In April we declared war, you remember, and within two weeks from the date of the declaration Roy Hodge had forty acres of cotton planted and had made arrangements with negro families living nearby to have it worked and picked, and had left the money with his father to pay for the work.

It was raining the day Roy went with me to the recruiting station in Centralia, and I had up the storm curtains as I whisked him down Broussard Street.

"Marines," he replied when the recruiting officer asked what branch of the service he wished to join. "I notice it says they are the first to fight."

"You'll get overseas quick enough with the marines," laughed the officer. "My, my, what muscles! Man, where did you get your training?"

Roy blushed and I answered for him.

"My debts will all be paid in the fall, and of course I will insure for Theo," he told me on our drive home. "I'll be gone from here in two more weeks, and I'll have to work to beat the band in the meantime."

That night I sat down and wrote his wife a long letter. I had her address from a brother physician, who had written me that she joined the Red Cross for training the next day after we joined the Allies.

You know the marine uniform. It's a nice looking uniform and it stands for a whole lot, too, just like our khaki does. Well, the best looking suit of it I ever saw was the one Roy Hodge wore away from here. And it looked its best when a pair of slender arms in a Red Cross apron were around it and a Red Cross cap was nestling just against the shoulder.

Stripes? Those stripes were forever and forever forgotten!

The Real Santa Claus

spoke; Mr. Burge was not in a happy frame of mind; and all were too busy thinking, in that deep, arresting silence, each impressed in an individual way with the sweet calm and splendor of the winter twilight.

Nearing the house, the children were on the alert to see their mother, who always met them at the door on such occasions with a hearty kiss. "There she is, Elsie—there's mamma! I saw her first!" cried Fred, as he espied that dear countenance, with the gentle faithful eyes, and the light hair, clinging round it like a halo.

Mrs. Burge was not like herself. She seemed to have lost the old, child-like glee and happy assurance which Fred remembered in her bearing on other, happier Christmas Eves. But she had prepared a warm, cozy supper for them, and had arranged a tree for the children, decorating with the ornaments which she had saved from other happier years when Christmas brought joy and gladness to her own heart because the little ones were made happy.

As she tucked the children in their beds that night, Fred put both his hands up to her face and whispered, "Santa will come surely, won't he, mamma?"

"I hope so, darling," as she stooped down and kissed that round, upturned face; and then she slipped quietly out of the room to hide her grief, well knowing there would be no Santa for them that night.

Fred was so anxious that he tried to stay awake, so as to be sure to hear when Santa and his deer arrived. He waited one hour—he waited two—but nothing was heard of Santa. Finally, he crawled quietly out of bed and stood looking down into the long, broad roadway.

Gloriously, the moon, like a heavily-laden treasure boat, gleamed down from the sky, shedding its soft white rays over the neighboring landscape and lighting up objects in the far away distance. All was the stillness, calm and splendor of a painted vision.

Disappointed, but not disheartened, the child crept back into his warm bed, and listened and listened, till presently he fancied that far, far in the distance he heard sleigh bells jingle; and then he was sure he heard sweet music, like that of a boy's voice, in the air. Then— then—he knew no more till morning dawned, and with a bound he leaped from bed.

"Merry Christmas, mamma! Merry Christmas, papa! Merry Christmas, sister!" he called, hurriedly dressing.

His mother arose, too, arose, as she thought, to face bravely the inevitable sorrow and disappointment which the day must bring her loved ones.

"Mamma, he came—he came—I heard him!" Fred whispered as they met at the entrance to his mother's room.

"Darling," she whispered back, stroking lovingly the curly head, "darling, you must not be too ——too——" but Fred did not wait for her to finish. He bounded away from her.

Here and there he ran all over the old house, peering into every nook that Santa had been known to visit in years gone by. Mrs. Burge, meanwhile, busied herself in the kitchen, getting ready for the morning meal, and now and then wiping away the tears that would, in spite of all she could do, stream down her cheeks.

Crestfallen when all search failed, but still not vanquished, Fred presently came back to her.

"He is sure one wise one, that Santa," he said. "He hid our presents this year for fair. I guess neither papa nor any of the rest of us can find them this year. Come on, mamma, help me hunt for them, won't you?"

"Fred, dear," his mother began softly, trying to get courage to break the news to him.

But Fred was too full of his own ideas to hear her.

"I know he was here," he said, "for I was watching, and when he did not come I crept back to bed, and then I heard his sleigh bells and I heard the angels singing, too, ever so loud 'Merry Christmas, Merry Christmas, Merry Christmas to all!'"

Mrs. Burge bent her head over her work, and tears unheeded splashed down upon her hands.

"He came right up the road," Fred prattled away in all his boyish confidence and enthusiasm. "I heard him, and I bet I can see his tracks out there in the snow."

With that, he opened the door to look, and such a shout as rent the air.

"It's here, mamma! it's here! Didn't I tell you he came, that I heard him and heard the angels singing? Papa! Elsie! Come quick! Gee, what a big box! From Santa Claus! That's what it says. Whee—ee!"

The family gathered in glee around the big box, which stood there so unconcernedly, bearing its precious message of good-will. On opening it, they found it contained nuts, candy, fruit, and many toys, such as would delight the hearts of any children of Fred and Elsie's age. And kind old Santa had not forgotten the older "children," for there were gifts of a more substantial nature for Mr. and Mrs. Burge—some choice cookies, a large plump fruit cake, a bouncing turkey, and several articles of wearing apparel, which included a pair of shoes each for Mrs. Burge's cherubs.

As the parents stood by, watching the holy glee of their little ones Mrs. Burge placed her hand affectionately on her husband's shoulder and said, "Jim the longest day you ever live, don't say again there is no Santa Claus."

"Never again, Sophie! Never again—I'm through!" exclaimed Jim solemnly. "Sophie, Santa Claus is as real as God Himself!"

Meantime, in a little confectionery store in the village, a young Italian, named Toney Parillo, went about his morning work, a deep smile on his face, his merry eyes sparkling, and his soft boyish voice singing, as only an Italian can sing, "Merry Christmas, Merry Christmas, Merry Christmas to all!"

As a result of experiments conducted by the Forest Products Laboratory, United States Department of Agriculture, a good grade of paper is being produced in commercial quantities from cotton-hull fiber. Pulp made from second-cut cotton linters and hull fiber, the forest specialists say, is well suited for the manufacture of book, writing, printing, blotting, cover, and other high grades of paper, and is equal in quality to the highest grades of paper stock.

673 Cash Prizes!

For the best letters telling why every American family should eat Partola Candies—"The Doctor in Candy Form."

We know that if Partola could be introduced into every American home just once, most of these homes would never be without it thereafter. In order to get Partola introduced into as many homes as possible, we are offering 673 cash prizes for the best letters telling why Partola should be in every home. From these letters we will get your opinions which we will use in our advertising.

Every man, woman, boy or girl is eligible for entry into this contest. All you have to do is to write us a letter—not to exceed 100 words — and tell us why you prefer Partola candies.

The prizes are as follows: for the best letter, $150.00 cash; for the next two best letters, $100.00 each; for the next four best letters $50.00 each; for the next six best letters, $25.00 each; for the next ten best letters, $10.00 each; for the next fifty best letters, $5.00 each; for the next two hundred best letters, $2.00 each; for the next four hundred best letters, $1.00 each—making a total of 673 prizes!

Contest closes February 15th, 1920, and list of prize winners will be announced later.

REMEMBER—you do not have to be an advertising writer to compete in this contest. Just write what you think of Partola and why you prefer it. All you have to know about is Partola. In order to give you some of the main points and advantages of Partola, we reproduce here an article which recently appeared in a New York newspaper. Read every word of it carefully. Find out what Partola is; what it does; how delicious it is and why it is favored by thousands of American men and women all over the country.

Try to get one of these 673 cash prizes. There are enough prizes so that one who really acquaints himself with the merit of Partola should have a good chance to win something. Note: Free trial sample will be sent upon request.

How to Fight Your Secret Enemies

By Modern Method of Internal Hygiene

Disease germs are our deadliest enemies because they remain out of sight and do not make known their presence until after they strike their blows.

In certain parts of the body it is easy to get at the germs and drive them out. For example: the mouth, nose, teeth and throat. Germ killing mouth washes and dentifrices have long been endorsed by the medical profession and, in fact, are used daily by all careful people.

But—what about the germs that enter the body with the food and lodge in the digestive organs? What measures have been adopted to rid the system of these secret enemies?

Until recently little attention was paid to the practice of internal hygiene but, with the newly recognized health necessity—intestinal antisepsis—thousands of folks now demand the pleasant tasting, antiseptic and laxative tablets, Partola.

Two Important Purposes

Partola has a double duty. First, it cleanses the bowels and gently stimulates the liver. In this respect its action is similar to that of ordinary laxatives. But Partola does more—it exerts a disinfectant action on the stomach and intestinal tract, very much the same as antiseptic mouth washes exert on the teeth and throat.

Partola is new in principle and it should not be confused with ordinary, old-fashioned laxatives. While it does anything ANY laxative can do, its additional value as an internal antiseptic makes it much more valuable to folks who wish to protect themselves from the inside as well as the outside.

Delicious as Bon Bons

In addition to its high medicinal value for young and old, remember that Partola comes in the form of a delicious mint candy. There is no taste or odor of medicine about it.

IMPQRTANT: Two Partola candies, taken at night, act as a laxative. And one tablet per night thereafter (for a short period) will remove the most stubborn case of constipation. If you are not troubled by constipation, simply take one-half candy daily for its invaluable antiseptic action on the digestive organs.

Favored by Young and Old

Partola—"The Doctor in Candy Form"—is sold by all good druggists in boxes ranging from 25 cents to $1.00. Obtain a package today, use them for the whole family — children, mother and father—and thus secure easy and inexpensive protection, not only from constipation, but from dangerous intestinal poisons, infections and germs.

All good druggists sell Partola in 25c, 50c and $1.00 boxes. If your druggist's stock is exhausted he can quickly get Partola for you.

Stop!

Using Tobacco

Perhaps you've tried to stop using tobacco only to find that the habit has such a hold on you that you gave up trying.

You know, better than anyone else that you ought to stop because, sooner or later, it is bound to undermine your health. Heart trouble, indigestion, dyspepsia, nervousness, insomnia, poor eye sight—these and many other disorders, can often be traced directly to the use of tobacco. Besides it is an expensive, utterly useless habit.

Habit Banished
In 48 to 72 Hours

No matter how firm a grip tobacco has on you—no matter whether you've been smoking cigars, pipe or cigarettes or chewing plug or fine cut for a month or 50 years—Tobacco Redeemer will positively remove all craving for tobacco in any form in from 48 to 72 hours. It does its work so quickly that all tobacco "hunger" is gone almost before you know it. Your desire for a smoke or a chew begins to decrease after the very first dose.

Tobacco Redeemer contains no habit-forming drugs of any kind—it is in no sense a tobacco substitute. It does not cause the slightest shock to the nervous system; on the contrary, it quiets the nerves and makes you feel better in every way.

SEND Coupon for Proof Get our free booklet. Tells you all about the deadly effects of tobacco and how easy it is now to quit. We will also send you copies of letters from confirmed users telling how this simple, home-treatment freed them absolutely from the habit. Just mail coupon—or a postal will do.

The Menace of Filth

MEN do not as a general rule understand or appreciate the dangers possible from dirt in the surroundings of animals. We do not refer to soil, often erroneously and insultingly termed dirt. We mean filth, and it is found wherever hogs and other animals are kept and not properly cared for. To it are attributable most of the diseases which take such a toll every year on the farms of the country. Tetanus (lockjaw) is more apt to occur upon the farm than anywhere else, for the deadly germ causing it—the tetanus bacillus—is found in all dirty places on the farm. It cannot stand light and air. They soon kill it dead. Tuberculosis, also, is caused by a germ that soon dies if exposed to direct sunlight, and that is true of many other germs. So it is absolutely necessary to keep stock pens, stables and yards as clean as possible and frequently to disinfect such places. That can be done effectively and cheaply with a five per cent solution of compound cresol solution, or commercial coal tar disinfectant, or with a solution of five ounces of formaldehyde to a gallon of water. Especially is it necessary to keep hog quarters clean and to keep these animals out of old hog wallows and small running streams. The wallow contains all manner of dangerous germs, and those of cholera and some other deadly diseases are carried by running water. The intestines of hogs naturally contain germs known as the bacillus necrophorus, and that filth germ is the cause of a lot of disaster. It produces, for example, canker sore mouth of pigs; bullnose or snuffles of hogs; sloughing skin disease of hogs which often causes loss of tails and ears and the worst kind of intestinal disease, often mistaken for cholera and known as necrotic enteritis. Then, too, it causes chronic sores about the heels of cattle and horses, foot rot in sheep, necrotic stomatitis or "calf diphtheria," so deadly to calves, and the same fatal disease among lambs. It may have to do with the infection of the navel of all new-born animals, and generally is present in every eating, obstinate sore. Cleanliness, fresh air and sunlight, together with the use of disinfectants and whitewash, prevent most of these troubles. Let every reader put them to work.

PARALYSIS.—I have two hogs a year old that are down in their hind parts. They are in good condition and eat heartily. What ails them and is there a cure? J. C. M.

A.—Overfeeding and constipation from lack of exercise often causes such conditions. If free opening of the bowels with a four- to six-ounce dose of epsom salts in warm water or slop does not remedy matters so that the hogs can rise, it would be best to slaughter them and use the meat if no serious disease is found present. If the extremities are cold and do not flinch when pricked with a needle, treatment will prove useless.

ABNORMAL MILK.—Please tell me what is the matter with my cow. She is four years old and is with calf, giving two and one half gallons of milk each day. I churn three hours and get about one tablespoonful of butter from two milkings. I feed her on peanut meal, hay, potato vines and corn-stalks. She is rolling fat. MRS. M. H. R.

A.—If the cow is pregnant it would be best to dry off the milk flow as she has been milking too long. If she is not pregnant it would be best to kill her for meat or sell her to the butcher as she is "rolling fat," which is not a good condition for a dairy cow. If you do not care to do as we have suggested, feed ground barley or oats, wheat bran, hominy and flaxseed or cottonseed meal, or some such combination of dairy feeds. Get a starter from a creamery man and follow his instructions as to the correct temperature at which cream should be set and churned in your climate.

DEATH OF CALF.—Please give me information about my calf. She was six months old, when her urine became bloody. She was drenched with saltpetre and soot tea but it did no good. She lived nearly three days but would not eat or drink. What ailed her and what could we have done to cure her? Was it bloody murrain? Is there a cure for it, and is it contagious? I would not do without COMFORT. E. C. H.

A.—The symptoms indicated either anthrax (bloody murrain) or hemorrhagic septicemia. Both diseases are incurable, but may be prevented by vaccination. Keep calves off the pasture where the death occurred or the disease was contracted and have a veterinarian vaccinate the remaining cattle if he can determine which disease was present.

PLUMPING A HORSE.—I am writing for information. What shall I give horses to plumpen them? C. T.

A.—We know of nothing so good as plenty of nutritious, palatable feed to put a horse in good shape for sale. A quart of black-strap molasses diluted with hot water and mixed with cornmeal, wheat bran and cut hay fed twice daily soon puts polish on a thin horse. Feed whole oats at noon and long hay at night. The amount of molasses may be increased if seen to be necessary. It sometimes is necessary to starve a horse to take molasses feed, but soon he will take it with relish. The drug used to plump horses is Fowler's solution of arsenic. The dose is half an ounce twice daily and this may gradually be increased. When no longer needed it should gradually be discontinued, taking at least ten days to the process.

MAMMITIS.—What is the trouble with my cow? When I milk her, the teats feel slimy, the milk clogs and turns to clabber. Is there a cure? J. S.

A.—The disease is mammitis or garget and is caused by germs, and in this case having become chronic and severe, it is incurable. It would be best to dry off any remaining milk secretion and fit the cow for slaughter, if you think that will pay. Treatment for garget is given in another answer this month.

GARGET.—I have a cow that gave lumpy milk about three months before she freshened and still continues, sometimes in one teat and then another. She will go a week or two and her milk appears to be all right. I am a reader of COMFORT. R. A. T.

A.—The disease is garget (mammitis) and usually proves incurable in cases such as you describe. Improvement may result if you milk three times a day and try to keep the cow from chilling or bruising her udder. Milk at exactly the same hours each day. At times of attack, milk every two or three hours and at night give a tablespoonful each of powdered saltpeter and poke root in feed or water. Massage the udder at each milking and at night, when affected with garget, rub in a mixture of one part each of turpentine and fluid extracts of poke root and belladonna and eight parts of melted lard or sweet oil.

WEAK MULE.—I have a young mule and when I have driven her eight or ten miles she begins to stumble or falter in her hind legs. What can I do? MRS. E. W.

A.—The mule has been overdriven for her age so should be rested and well fed until she becomes strong again. Let her run on pasture and feed oats, ear corn, bran and good hay in addition. Have her feet properly trimmed by the smith and have her shod when you start driving her again. Keep her off dry board floors.

COWS DYING.—Do cows that are fat and sleek have tuberculosis? I have a cow that has been coughing for two years or longer. She is fat and looks as if nothing was wrong with her. Another cow is giving milk and is thin and coughs. The third cow will freshen in two months. I have noticed her cough two or three times. She has been fed a little and had the same pasture the other cattle have. E. D.

A.—Tuberculosis probably causes the cough and other symptoms described. It is quite common for a cow to be affected and yet look well. The only way of determining the matter will be to have the cows tested with tuberculin, and you can arrange to have that done free by writing to the state veterinarian. Or write to the state agricultural experiment station for instructions how to proceed and as to the law relative to reimbursement. Milk of tuberculous cows is highly dangerous to man and animals.

Best Way of Doing Things Around The Home

Peach stains can be removed by using spirits of camphor.

To soften boots or shoes rub a little castor oil well into the leather.

To keep apple sauce from turning dark add the beaten white of an egg.

To keep cheese from getting moldy put it in glass fruit jars that are air tight.

Wet grease spots on clothing with kerosene, then wash as usual, and the grease will have disappeared.

When opening this year's jelly glasses, save the paraffin for next year's jelly. It can be melted and used again.

To remove rust stains from white goods, dip a piece of lemon in salt and rub it on the stain. Let it remain half an hour. Wash and if stain is not entirely removed, repeat process.—P. A., Reedville, Ore.

Cook cranberries in a double boiler with no water except that in the larger outside dish. They are better cooked in this way than in the ordinary manner. A small piece of apple or a few raisins added to the cranberries while cooking will improve the flavor.

Instead of buying a new wick for my oil stove I buy two lamp wicks which are much cheaper. I cut the old wick down past the first row of holes and baste the lamp wick around by running needle through these little holes at top of old wick. Do not overlap them. —TEXAS FRIEND, Bay City, Texas.

What 15c WILL BRING You FROM THE Nation's Capital

Washington, the home of the Pathfinder, has become the World's Capital and reading the Pathfinder will be like sitting in the inner council with those who will mold the world's destiny for the next generation

The little matter of 15 cts. in stamps or coin will bring you the Pathfinder 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center for the Nation; a paper that prints all the news of the world and tells the truth and only the truth; now in its 27th year. This paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, briefly--here it is. Send 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder 13 weeks. The 15c does not repay us, but we are glad to invest in new friends. THE PATHFINDER, Box 79, Washington, D. C.

$600 1920 MODEL FORD CAR Given

FIRST GRAND PRIZE

On February 28, 1920, I am going to give away a $600 Ford Touring Car, fully equipped with the new Ford Self Starter and Lighting System, to some one who answers my Ad, and is the most successful in carrying out my simple instructions. Give COMFORT To Your Friends As A Christmas Present!

WHY not! In these days of high prices where could you find a better, more inexpensive present than a one-year's subscription to COMFORT?

It is the one gift that pleases everybody—a gift that will become a cheery, welcome reminder of you month after month for an entire year—and at so little expense you will not notice it at all. Simply send us 50 cents and the name and address of the friend you wish to remember written on the coupon below and we will enter the subscription for one full year to commence with our Christmas number and with it we will also mail a beautiful Christmas Presentation Card so that both paper and card will reach your friend at about the same time. The card is beautifully colored and embossed with a dainty appropriate Christmas design and verse on one side and on the other side is a specially printed announcement of the gift and a space left for your name as the giver which we will fill in ourselves before the card is mailed.

Isn't this a splendid idea? Surely among all your friends there is someone who will appreciate and enjoy such an interesting magazine as COMFORT and who will think of you gratefully every time the carrier leaves it at the door.

Better send us your friend's name and the money now—it's none too early to avoid the Christmas rush—and you will have at least one present less to think about because we will attend to all the details. After you mail the coupon and money you can dismiss the matter from your mind as we will take good care of your order and mail both the paper and the handsome Christmas Presentation Card properly filled out with your name as the giver at precisely the right time.

Ruptured? — Throw Away Your Truss!

For Many Years We Have Been Telling You That No Truss Will Ever Help You—We Have Told You the Harm That Trusses Are Doing. We Have Told You That the Only Truly Comfortable and Scientific Device for Holding Rupture Is the Brooks Rupture Appliance—and That It Is

Sent on Trial to Prove It

If you have tried most everything else, come to us. Where others fail is where we have our greatest success. Send attached coupon today and we will send you free our illustrated book on Rupture and its cure, showing our Appliance and giving you prices and names of many people who have tried it and were cured. It is instant relief when all others fail. Remember, we use no salves, no harness, no lies.

We send on trial to prove what we say is true. You are the judge and once having seen our illustrated book and read it you will be as enthusiastic as our hundreds of patients whose letters you can also read. Fill out free coupon below and mail today. It's well worth your time whether you try our Appliance or not.

The above is C. E. Brooks, Inventor of the Appliance. Mr. Brooks Cured Himself of Rupture Over 30 Years Ago and Patented the Appliance from His Personal Experience. If Ruptured Write Today to the Brooks Appliance Co., Marshall, Mich.

Ten Reasons Why

You Should Send For Brooks Rupture Appliance

1. It is absolutely the only Appliance of the kind on the market today, and in it are embodied the principles that inventors have sought after for years.
2. The Appliance for retaining the rupture cannot be thrown out of position.
3. Being an air cushion of soft rubber it clings closely to the body, yet never blisters or causes irritation.
4. Unlike the ordinary so-called pads, used in other trusses, it is not cumbersome or ungainly.
5. It is small, soft and pliable, and positively cannot be detected through the clothing.
6. The soft, pliable bands holding the Appliance do not give one the unpleasant sensation of wearing a harness.
7. There is nothing about it to get foul, and when it becomes soiled it can be washed without injuring it in the least.
8. There are no metal springs in the Appliance to torture one by cutting and bruising the flesh.
9. All of the material of which the Appliances are made is of the very best that money can buy, making it a durable and safe Appliance to wear.
10. Our reputation for honesty and fair dealing is so thoroughly established by an experience of over thirty years of dealing with the public, and our prices are so reasonable, our terms so fair, that there certainly should be no hesitancy in sending free coupon today.

Soundly Cured

At the Age of 81

Mr. C. E. Brooks,
Marshall, Mich.
Dear Sir:—

Less than a year ago I sent to you for an appliance which came promptly. I at once put it on and it fitted perfectly. I have worn the appliance not quite 10½ months. It has cured my rupture.

I tried the other day while the appliance was off, to see if I could force anything out of the opening to make a break there but I could not though I tried hard.

Now I think this quite remarkable as I am in my eighty-first year. I am an old veteran of the Civil War, born and raised in the town of New Boston, State of New Hampshire, from which place I enlisted in the 10th N. H. Vol. Inft. in Co. C, commanded by Col. M. T. Donahue.

I cannot feel but that I owe you this testimony for I had never expected to be cured. However, thanks be to God I found a cure through the valuable appliance you made for me.

Your friend,
Holly Hill, Fla. E. A. Richards

Cured Without Operation

"Was Sure He Would Be a Cripple"

Ada, Minn.

Mr. C. E. Brooks, Marshall, Mich.
Dear Sir:—

Enclosed is a picture of my children, and the little man you see seated on the chair is the one who was cured by your Appliance.

He had been ruptured quite a while before we wrote you, and I was sure that that he would be a cripple the rest of his life. However, some helping hand showed me an ad. in a newspaper, with the result that he was in perfect health through the wearing of a Brooks Appliance for just three months.

The doctor advised an operation, which I would not consent to. Your advice was to put an Air Cushion Appliance on him, and I must say that it is worth ten times what it cost.

I wish you could have seen him before we used the Appliance and now, when he is fully as sound as anyone could be.

I cannot thank you too much for what you have done for my boy.

Yours respectfully,
OLIVER HANSON.

Cured in Three Months

Salem, Ohio.
430 Cleveland Ave.
Mr. C. E. Brooks,
Marshall, Mich.
Dear Mr. Brooks:—

I am sending you a small picture of my son who is now five years old.

We ordered your Appliance for him when he was only two months old, and yet want to say in about three months all signs of rupture were gone, and he is some boy today.

I shall be very glad to say a good word for you whenever the opportunity presents itself.

Yours very truly,
T. A. McCLAIN.

Veteran Cured

Mr. Wm. McAdams, of Kansas, Ill., is a veteran of Co. "H" 59, Regt. Ill. Vol. of which he was Second Lieutenant.

He has fought against the suffering and torment of Rupture for years and has finally won the victory as the following brief letter tells:

Mr. C. E. Brooks,
Marshall, Mich.
Dear Sir:—I laid your appliance aside March 2nd and have not worn it for twenty-five days, for I think that I am cured. I hope that I may never have to wear it again.

Yours truly,
Wm. McAdams, Sr., Kansas, Ill.

Doctor Pronounces Him Cured

119 Towle Avenue,
Mishawaka, Ind.
Mr. C. E. Brooks,
Marshall, Mich.
Dear Mr. Brooks:—

Answering your letter, will say we need no more Appliances, as our son has been completely cured by wearing your Appliance.

We recently had him examined, and the doctor said the opening was entirely closed and that it wasn't necessary to wear it longer.

Thanking you for your kind-kindness, I am,

Yours very truly,
MRS. H. TOLLMAN.

Remember

We send our Appliance on trial to prove what we say is true. You are to be the judge. Fill out free coupon below and mail today.

Pennsylvania Man Thankful

Mr. C. E. Brooks, Marshall, Mich.

Dear Sir:—Perhaps it will interest you to know that I have been ruptured six years and have always had trouble with it till I got your Appliance. It is very easy to wear, fits neat and snug, and is not in the way at any time, day or night. In fact, at times I did not know I had it on; it just adapted itself to the shape of the body and seemed to be a part of the body, as it clung to the spot, no matter what position I was in.

It would be a veritable God-send to the unfortunate who suffer from rupture if all could procure the Brooks Rupture Appliance and wear it. They would certainly never regret it.

My rupture is now all healed up and nothing ever did it but your Appliance. Whenever the opportunity presents itself I will say a good word for your Appliance, and also the honorable way in which you deal with ruptured people. It is a pleasure to recommend a good thing among your friends or strangers. I am,

Yours very sincerely,
JAMES A. BRITTON.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

Dangers that Lurk in Government Price Fixing and Market Manipulation

ARBITRARY fixing of prices by trusts or any combination of interests or by the Government is, in the long run, sure to work injustice to consumers or producers and react in a manner detrimental to the welfare of the community. Any interference with the operation of the natural law of supply and demand involves innumerable possibilities of evil consequences. Such interference on the part of private interests is prohibited by the anti-trust and other laws of similar intent, and the Government should refrain from fixing the price or monopolizing the market for any commodity except for the purpose of meeting an emergency occasioned by war or other pressing necessity of a public nature. There is room for doubt whether under any conditions government price fixing is expedient, but certain it is that, if resorted to, such action should be safeguarded with the utmost care and caution for the avoidance of unfair discrimination and burdensome results such as have risen from some of the war-time price fixing by our Government.

Of all the great food exporting countries of the world the United States and Canada profited most by the war needs of Europe because most accessible. Australia and Argentina, our chief rivals in food production, previous to the World War had supplied Europe with a large part of its grain and meats, but their remoteness and the scarcity of ships debarred their products from access to the European market during the war, so that they actually burned surplus wheat that they could neither ship nor store. Thus forced by stress of circumstances every country in Europe, except Germany and her Allies which were cut off by the blockade, was bidding frantically for American food products up to the time the United States entered the war. The supply was limited and inadequate, and as a natural consequence of this competitive bidding prices continually rose until our Government, soon after entering the war, fixed the prices and monopolized the market for the more important food commodities.

Government Controlled the Market and Price of Wheat

AS the food shortage presented one of the most difficult and vital problems of the war it became necessary and therefore proper for our Government, on entering the conflict, to take control, as it did, of the food resources of the country. But even the necessities of war did not absolve the Government from its constitutional obligation to make just compensation to the owners for property and rights so taken. Let us consider what effect the Government's action in regard to wheat has had on the rights and interests of the farmers. Did the farmers get a square deal?

By means of a license system regulating the milling of wheat and the sale of wheat and flour and by placing an embargo on the exportation of wheat and flour, except under special permit, the Government acquired absolute control of the wheat market and practical control of the market for other grains. By so doing competitive bidding for foreign shipment was abolished and our Government became the largest purchaser, buying enormous quantities, not only on its own account for our army and navy, but also as purchasing agent for England, France, Italy and the other allied countries. So they all got their American wheat and flour through our Government at the same price.

Where It Rubs the Farmers

THE purpose and effect of this policy was to steady the wheat market; but the steadying influence was exerted in the direction of preventing wheat prices from soaring to levels deemed undesirably high by those in authority at Washington. One of the avowed purposes of the Government's regulation of the wheat market and prices was to prevent speculating and profiteering, but, as we shall see, our Government did a bit of profiteering in wheat on its own account. No doubt the price of wheat would have ranged much higher the past two years—some authorities estimate as high as three, three and a half or possibly four dollars a bushel the last year of the war—but for the Government's action in eliminating competitive bidding for export.

Government's Guaranteed Price to the Farmers

THAT the price of wheat would have ranged higher in a free competitive market we find corroborative evidence in the reported transactions of the U. S. Grain Corporation, created, owned, financed and managed by the Government as the instrumentality through which the price of American grown wheat is kept up to the Government's guaranty. The Grain Corporation buys wheat whenever offered for sale in this country at the price guaranteed to the farmers by the Government, but never at higher prices. It appears that the Grain Corporation has made a profit (which goes to the Government) of twenty-six million dollars. Of this sum four and a half million dollars came out of millers' profits and practically all the rest, some twenty-one and a half million dollars, was made on sales to neutral countries, as all sales to our Allies during the war were at cost. Which appears to indicate clearly that, had our wheat market been open to foreign buyers, these neutrals would have been there bidding up the market. It shows that wheat was worth more for export than our Government was paying for that purchased for its own account and for our Allies. Of course this policy helped to keep down the cost of the war to this Government and to our Allies, and kept down the price of flour to our own people; but whatever the saving—and it must have been many millions—was at the expense of the farmers.

The war virtually ended with the armistice over a year ago, and the war emergency, which alone justified the wheat embargo, ceased months ago. So evident was this that last summer, when the early crop reports indicated a billion-and-a-quarter bushel wheat crop in this country, Mr. Barnes, the Wheat Director, called President Wilson's attention to the facts and recommended that the wheat embargo be lifted immediately so to restore a free export market for our wheat. But President Wilson decided that, because of the agitation over high cost of living, it would be unwise to lift the embargo at that time for fear it might possibly result in higher cost of flour. And so the embargo was continued to keep down the cost of flour for the industrial laborers regardless of the interests of the farmers.

Scarcity of Sugar Under Government Control of Market

THE Sugar Equalization Board was established by the Government in July 1918 as an adjunct of the Food Administration for the purpose of insuring to the American people a regular supply of sugar at a reasonable price, during the unsettled conditions caused by war. It was empowered to fix the price and regulate the distribution of sugar, and to buy and sell sugar, under the President's direction, in furtherance of this purpose. The Board established living prices for Louisiana cane sugar and western beet sugar and bought up in advance the entire sugar output of Cuba for the year 1919 which began to reach our market about a year ago. The price paid for the Cuban raw sugar was about five and a half cents a pound, which enabled the Board to fix the wholesale price of granulated in the eastern markets at nine cents with a fair margin of profit to American refiners.

The result of this prudent action by the Sugar Equalization board was, as our readers will remember, that there was an abundance of sugar at a reasonable price the past year until about canning time last summer when a sudden scarcity developed which has grown more acute to the present time, relieved to some extent in the late fall in the beet-sugar sections. There is a world shortage of sugar, but the wants of American consumers would have been very well met had not the Board miscalculated our domestic needs and sold a third of the Cuban sugar crop to England and others of the Allies early in the year. However, in fairness to the Sugar Board it should be stated that the consumption of sugar in the United States has been unusually large the past year.

Sugar Will Be Higher in 1920 and Scarce at That

LAST July representatives of the Cuban sugar producers, with the approval of the Cuban government, offered to sell their entire 1920 output to our Sugar Equalization Board at six and a half cents a pound. On August 14 the Sugar Board applied to President Wilson for authority to take action on this offer, at the same time informing him that "there is today a world sugar shortage and that * * * * it seems probable that the world sugar shortage for 1920 will be more acute than for the year 1919." The Sugar Board advised that negotiations for the purchase of the Cuban sugar be begun at once. As the Sugar Board could not act in the matter without orders from the President, the Board on September 20 urged Mr. Wilson to render his decision on the subject. But if President Wilson ever decided what to do about it he was too late, for on September 22 the Cuban Sugar Commissioners withdrew their offer, and thus was lost the golden opportunity for the United States to secure at a low price an abundant supply of sugar for 1920. Since then the Cuban producers have been selling their new crop of raw sugar at from eight and a half to twelve cents a pound. These prices are for raw sugar in Cuba, and to them must be added the cost of transportation, refining and distribution including wholesalers' and retailers' profits, which means that probably we may have to pay fifty to seventy-five per cent. more for sugar in 1920 than in 1919, and a scarce article at that. The result is hardly in line with the announced policy of reducing the high cost of living. Congressman Tinkham, of Massachusetts, estimates that the Government's failure to purchase the Cuban sugar crop will cost American consumers three hundred and sixty to five hundred and forty million dollars.

Fixing Milk Prices by Law

THOSE city numskulls who imagined they had turned a smart trick by fixing the price of milk at a figure that allowed little or no profit to producers have learned to their sorrow that it is a proposition on which the dairyman have the last word. The answer of not a few has taken the form of quietly going out of the milk business and turning their attention to some other line of farming that paid better under the circumstances, while the consumers are reaping the consequences of their selfishness and stupidity in the form of a milk shortage. There are many clamoring for laws to arbitrarily reduce prices who have yet to learn the futility of attempting to regulate prices regardless of cost of production. Milk is cheap compared with other foods at prevailing prices and it is unfortunate that the dairy business is not sufficiently profitable to induce the farmers to increase their herds to keep pace with the growth of population. In 1918 the number of cows in this country remained stationary. Europe is bidding for our dairy products and an increasing portion of them is going abroad where their food and health value is better appreciated. For health and economy we should use more milk.

His Heart's Queen

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

An expert in the establishment soon set a price upon Violet's pretty ornaments.

"Why, yes. I recognize almost everything there is here," his lordship returned.

That same evening he again examined the contents of that precious box.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

On a car, going up a steep hill, leading to the Zoological Gardens of Cincinnati, is Violet Draper Huntington. Opposite her sits Wallace Richardson. Nearly at the top of the hill, something beneath the car breaks. Wallace seizes Violet's hands and locking them behind his neck commands her to cling. The car crashes down, burying all the passengers beneath the ruins. They are the only two alive and hurried to Wallace Richardson's home, are cared for by his mother. Mrs. Mencke, Violet's sister provides a nurse and leaves orders for Violet to see no one. The nurse out for a walk, Violet goes to the adjoining room to meet Wallace and thank him for the life saved. As they become more friendly, Wallace realizes his danger and Violet is hopelessly in love. Violet asks Wallace to come with his mother to see her. Mrs. Mencke takes Violet to Saratoga for two months, then to Cincinnati, and home. The following day, picking up a paper, Violet reads of Mrs. Richardson's death. She goes to the Richardsons' house and expresses her sympathy to Wallace, who unconsciously calls her my darling, and asks her forgiveness. As she whispers, "I am glad," he knows she is all his own. Returning home, her sister demands where she has been, and learning it was at Mrs. Richardson's funeral, that she rides in the carriage with Wallace and Mrs. Dent, Mrs. Mencke denounces it as questionable and that she must drop him for all time. Wallace, calling upon Violet, Mr. and Mrs. Mencke return and she introduces him and admits he is her promised husband. She overhears Belle's and her husband's scheme to place her in a convent. Mrs. Mencke, proposing a trip to Montreal, Violet refuses to go, and Mrs. Mencke takes Mrs. Hawley, who is to sail for Europe and chaperone Nellie Bailey, into her confidence and requests her to induce Violet to join them. Violet makes ready for the proposed trip and Wallace is at the steamer to say good by. Vane Cameron and Ralph Henderson join Mr. and Mrs. Hawley's party and before the voyage is over Vane Cameron surrenders his heart to Violet. Mrs. Mencke schemes that no letters pass between Violet and Wallace and later, joining the party in Europe, gives her permission for Vane to win Violet. Failing to get Violet's consent, she produces a notice of Wallace Richardson's death, which throws Violet into a severe sickness, leaving her sad and heartbroken. Vane Cameron, receiving an encouraging letter from Mrs. Mencke, appears, and tells Violet the wish nearest his heart is to make her his wife. Violet confesses to Vane her love for Wallace Richardson, her sister's opposition, concealing nothing. Knowing she is unhappy from causes other than Wallace's death, Vane urges her to allow him to give her his name, to shield her from sorrow and care. Violet, afraid to yield, and hesitating, faints. Ringing a bell, Mrs. Mencke enters. Recovering consciousness, Violet questions did she promise, and being assured by her sister that she has, she faints again. Mrs. Mencke informs Lord Cameron that Violet acknowledges the engagement, and later she consents to what he thinks best, but with many misgivings. Mrs. Mencke, entering Violet's room, finds the bed made and the room in order and no trace discovered of her. Four weeks later, Lord Cameron, returning from a fruitless search, sees a group near a cliff and the body of a woman upon the beach, clad in dark grey suit with bands of blue silk. Believing it is Violet, Lord Cameron selects a spot near the sea. The next day a stranger appears and requests to meet the woman reported to have married Lord Cameron. Being questioned by the Menckes his right, his answer thrills all—"the most sacred right in the world, for—she is my wife!" Wilhelm Mencke doubting the marriage, Wallace produces the marriage certificate and Vane Cameron confirms it by Violet's admission of it to him. Then he relates her loyalty to Wallace, her unhappiness, the treatment received, her disappearance and later the finding of her body by drowning and the burial. Wallace falls unconscious and Lady Cameron and Vane remain with Wallace through a severe illness. Riding through the crowded streets, Wallace catches the glimpse of a face, looking from a coach window, which unmans him. Vane consoles him with what he knows. Wallace returns to New York, building up a fine business. In the meanwhile, Wilhelm Mencke squanders all at the gaming table and Mrs. Mencke returns to Cincinnati from which place she suddenly disappears. Violet returns to New York, securing a position as governess for Bertha Lawrence, who is partially blind and possessed of a strong will. She wins her affections, Mr. Lawrence treating her as a member of the family. Violet, on a shopping trip, unexpectedly meets Wilhelm Mencke, and refusing to give her address, he attempts to force her to tell. Mr. Lawrence makes arrangements for the summer and alone with himself determines to win Violet. Wilhelm secures Violet's address and learns that Wallace Richardson is in the city.

CHAPTER XXIV.

MR. MENCKE OVERREACHES HIMSELF.

WILHELM Mencke appeared to be considerably elated over the discoveries which he had made that afternoon, when Violet, so unconscious of the clouds that were beginning to lower in her sky, had attended the matinee with Mr. Lawrence and Bertha, and after reaching his miserable room, which was cold and bare and dirty, he lighted a fire and then a lamp, after which he lifted a loose board in the floor and drew forth what seemed to be a square package wrapped in thick brown paper.

Taking it to a table, he removed the wrapper, and revealed a small box about eight inches square. Opening this, he turned its contents upon the paper, and let all the pretty trinkets which Violet used to wear lie in a shining heap before him, and he began to spread them out one by one, a sinister smile on his coarse face.

There were several rings and brooches, two or three pairs of bracelets and ear pendants, her watch and chain and some pretty charms; taking them all together, it was quite a valuable collection for a young girl to have.

"I'm very glad I never sold 'em," he muttered, as, after a time, he began to gather them up and return them to the box; "there is nobody living that would give as much as he will for them, and I shall make him fork over handsomely for them. I could never have realized one tenth of their value if I'd pawned them."

He put them carefully away, and then, after taking a long pull from a large black bottle, he crawled into his miserable bed and was soon soundly sleeping.

A few days later, after making himself as respectable as possible—which is not saying very much in his favor—and armed with the box containing Violet's jewelry, he wended his way once more to the office of Harlow & Richardson.

Upon arriving at their rooms and inquiring for Mr. Richardson, he was told that he had just stepped out, but would be in again in a few minutes; if he wished to wait he could take a seat in the private office.

Mr. Mencke's finances were in such a critical state that he was willing to wait a good while, rather than miss the bargain which he meant to drive with Wallace.

He went into the inner office, and threw himself into one of the luxurious chairs.

Presently he heard the outer door open and close, then a few words were spoken in a low tone evidently by one of the clerks to the person who had entered, and the next moment Wallace came into the presence of the man whom he had last seen in Mentone, when he had been told of the supposed terrible fate of Violet, his young wife.

He started visibly, and every atom of color forsook his face as he recognized him.

He had not yet mastered his grief sufficiently to be able to meet any one associated with that wretched time, unmoved; but he quickly recovered himself, and was again his usual calm and courteous self.

"Mr. Mencke!" he said, bowing politely, but he could not conceal the pained, astonished look in his eyes, as he observed the unmistakable marks which more than a year of dissipation had written upon the man.

"Yes, and it is some time since you and I met," returned Mencke, trying to assume an easy air, though it was evident that he was embarrassed by uncomfortable memories and a sense of his own inferiority in the presence of the young man whom he had once affected to despise; "meanwhile," he added, "you have been making rapid strides along the road to fortune."

Wallace bowed courteously in reply to this, while he thought that he could not say as much for his visitor; then he inquired, with some constraint in his tone:

"Is there anything that I can do for you, sir?"

"Hum!" observed Mr. Mencke, assuming a wise look, "I came here thinking, perhaps, I could do something for you."

"Indeed?" Wallace remarked, with evident surprise.

"Yes; perhaps, though, you had better close the door," glancing toward the outer office, "as what I have to say, you might not like to have others hear."

Wallace quietly closed the door without making any reply, then he sat down by his desk and leaned his head upon his hand.

He was still quite pale, for the presence of this man revived many painful memories, while, from his request that the door might be shut, he imagined that he might have something to say to him about Violet.

"I have come here today upon a little matter of business as well as of sentiment," Mr. Mencke resumed, "and I may as well tell you frankly, to begin with, that I have been very unfortunate during the last year. I have lost a great deal of money in one way and another—am in fact deucedly hard up just now—and—I—ah!—ahem!—want to raise a little money to start myself again in a small way."

Wallace's eyes expressed the astonishment he could not conceal, for he knew that two years ago Wilhelm Mencke was supposed to be very wealthy while it was said that he held in trust thirty thousand dollars, or more, of Violet's money.

Of course, believing Violet to be dead, he had supposed her property would revert, by natural inheritance, to her sister, Mrs. Mencke, and that her husband still had control of it.

What could have become of it all in so short a time? He was amazed by the man's statement and doubly so that he should have thought of appealing to him in his embarrassment.

He made no reply, however, although his companion had paused evidently with the expectation that he would make some observation.

"I have heard," he resumed, presently, though a trifle shamefacedly, "that you are making piles of money and I thought—ah—perhaps, if I could give you good security, you might help me out."

Wallace sat erect now.

He wondered more and more at the man's cool effrontery and lack of shame in coming to solicit aid from him, after his abusive treatment of him in the past.

But he wished to have no dealings with him—he would have been glad if they had never met again.

"I have no money that I care to invest outside the line of my own business," he said, coldly.

Wilhelm Mencke smiled mysteriously.

He felt very sure that Wallace would give him money, and a handsome sum, too, before he got through with him.

"Ahem! Perhaps when you hear my proposals you may decide differently," he remarked, as he drew the box of trinkets from his pockets. "I must have some money at once, and if I cannot raise it in one way I must in another. I have a few articles here which, though they might not bring very much at a forced sale, might be considered invaluable, on account of the associations connected with them, by some persons. I myself have been loath to part with them heretofore on that account, but there are times when one has to sacrifice sentiment to necessity. I thought I'd give you the first chance at them since you might be said to be the most interested party; but if you don't care to avail yourself of the opportunity, of course I shall be obliged to realize what I can upon them elsewhere."

"I do not think I understand what you mean or want, Mr. Mencke," Wallace observed, looking perplexed and uncomfortable.

"Well, then, to come to the point at once, here are some things that were Violet's—her watch and chain and a lot of other trinkets, and I must raise money on them, and right soon, too," Wilhelm Mencke replied, as he uncovered the box, thus revealing the glitter of its precious contents to his companion.

A low cry of pain and horror burst from Wallace, as he now comprehended the man's purpose, and he threw out his hand with a gesture of suffering.

"What! Sell Violet's watch and jewelry!" he exclaimed, in a tone that shook with mingled emotion and indignation. "Shame!"

"Can't help it," returned his companion, in a stoical voice, though he flushed with guilty consciousness. "I'm in a bad box and I need money."

Wallace reached out and took the box from him, and his hand shook like a leaf as he did so.

He was terribly moved and could with difficulty retain his composure, for as he looked upon those pretty mementoes of happier days, a thousand tender memories came thronging upon him, threatening to completely unnerve him.

How well he remembered some of those jewels—others he had never seen.

The watch Violet had always worn, and it was marked with her initials—it had been a gift from her father, and she had prized it very highly.

How well, too, he remembered that emerald ring, for it had contrasted so prettily with her beautiful white hand, and with the solitaire diamond which had been its companion. There was also an amethyst, set with pearls and diamonds, which she had sometimes worn; and, more precious, in his sight, than all, her wedding ring, which he himself had placed upon her finger, that never-to-be-forgotten day when they had gone so quietly to the venerable clergyman in ——— Street, and plighted their vows to each other.

Hot tears rushed unbidden to his eyes as he looked upon it, for he remembered how Violet's lips had quivered as she told him that she should not dare to wear it until he could claim her as his wife; but she should keep it sacredly locked in her jewel-casket until the happy day should come when she could openly avow the bond that united them.

Yes, and there lay the pretty bracelets, too, which she had also worn upon that occasion, and the pin from which she had detached the pansy which she had given him as a keepsake that morning when she bade him farewell in his mother's sitting-room in Hughes Street. Several of the articles he had never seen, but since they had once belonged to her, his darling, and she had worn them, they were as precious to him as the apple of his eye.

The perspiration stood thick upon the young husband's brow, as he gazed upon these treasures, and strove to control the grief which well-nigh mastered him, while the memory of his lost happiness surged over him, producing something of the despair which he had experienced when they first told him that his dear one was dead.

Then as he gradually grew a little more calm, his whole soul arose in rebellion against the thought of their being sold for money, which he felt sure this miserable sot before him would only squander upon his depraved appetite.

Never! Every article was precious and sacred to him.

He could not bear that any one should even handle them with careless touch, or look upon them with indifferent eye.

Wilhelm Mencke had been cunning enough to realize that Wallace would feel thus, and that he would never allow any one else to become their purchaser, and now as he observed the young man's deep emotion, he told himself with an inward chuckle, that he might name almost any price he chose for them, and he would not fail to get it.

With a sigh that was almost a groan, Wallace at last recovered the glittering, but voiceful things, and still holding them in his hand, demanded, in a husky voice:

"How much do you want for this box and its contents, Mr. Mencke?"

"Exactly two thousand dollars will buy that box of jewelry, Mr. Richardson," the man answered, with a cunning gleam in his eyes.

Wallace flushed.

He saw that he had intended to take advantage of him from the first.

He knew that these articles of jewelry—at least some of them—were valuable, and he was willing to pay a fair sum for them, but this was absolute and shameless extortion.

"Mr. Mencke," he said, gravely, "you very well know that this jewelry does not begin to be worth the sum that you have named."

"Well, perhaps not," returned his companion, with a sly smile, "but the associations must be worth something. It would be worth considerable—at least I should suppose it would be to you—not to have your wife's jewelry pawned to fall into the hands of Tom, Dick, and Harry, or," he added, trying to be facetious, "Susan, Maria, and Jane, as the case might be."

Wallace was disgusted with his coarseness, though he winced visibly at the covert threat that they would be pawned if he did not buy them. But for the important matter under discussion, he would have had hard work not to seize him by the collar and forcibly eject him from the room.

He strove to conceal his aversion, however, and responded:

"What you say is true—these things are sacred to me, and I would never consent to such a disposition of them. I am willing to pay you their full value and something more for the sake of the associations; but I cannot give you the exorbitant price you have set upon them."

"Then you can't have 'em, that's all there is about it," bluntly retorted Wilhelm Mencke.

He had expected to find an easy prey in the "sentimental young fool," as he termed him, and it irritated him to find himself baffled.

Wallace bent his head in thought for a few moments, while the lines about his mouth began to grow firm and resolute, as they always did when he had difficulties to face and overcome.

"I will make you a proposition," he said, at last, meeting his companion's look with a stern purpose in his eye. "I will go with you to some reliable first-class jeweler, and he shall set a price upon every article in this box—I do not mean its actual value, but what it could be purchased for today—then I will pay you the sum he names and fifty dollars more for association's sake."

"No, sir! You don't get a single piece of it unless you come to my terms," retorted Wilhelm Mencke, angrily. "Two thousand dollars or—nothing. I would pawn it piece by piece for one third—yes, one fourth its value rather than let you have it a dollar less than the sum I have demanded."

"Why so? Why are you so determined to take such an unfair advantage of me?" Wallace demanded.

"That is none of your business!" rudely replied the man, with an oath.

"Yes, it is my business, and you know it," Wallace replied, in a calm but firm tone. "Violet was my wife, and whatever may be connected with her, or her memory, is most assuredly my business. Now tell me why you are so unreasonable in your demands upon me."

"Well, then, because I have an old grudge against you—an old score to settle with you," Mr. Mencke answered, with sullen defiance. "You outwitted us and married Violet in spite of us, and now I am going to get even with you and make you sweat for it if I can."

Wallace's lip curled with disdain.

Such a mean spirit of revenge was contemptible.

"Then I am to understand that you absolutely refuse to sell me the contents of this box upon

Big Roosevelt Memorial Number for February
Stories of Roosevelt and Other Presidents

As usual February COMFORT will be a large number made uncommonly attractive with special features appropriate to the mid-winter month which celebrates the birthdays of Washington, Lincoln and good St. Valentine—thrilling anecdotes of the most wonderful man of our time, a charming Valentine romance and how to make Home-Made Valentines are some of them. Don't miss February COMFORT.

Renew and extend your subscription today at present rate of 50 cents for one year, or better still send 75 cents for a two-year renewal. Use coupon on page 8.

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for idens, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

INSTEAD of the traditional inspiring talk on morals, high ideals and good resolutions which we look for at this time of the year, the space is devoted to "boosting" for Uncle Charlie and his Home Fund. I couldn't talk inspiringly if I tried and I wouldn't even if I could, for Uncle Charlie's work for one month alone is productive of more good than anything I could say in six months so by helping his cause along I feel that I am doing a little toward bettering the morals and ideals of the people. Thanks to all who have so generously contributed, and a Happy New Year to everyone. —Ed.

INDIANAPOLIS, BOX 354, R. R., IND.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT READERS:

I am a reader of COMFORT and enjoy it very much, especially the Sisters' Corner. I only wish it were issued twice a month. I always read the letters from country sisters because I live in the country myself.

I think I have the best hubby in all the world, baby and I. I am sending you a picture of baby which I would like to see in COMFORT. His name is Albert Franklin Perry, Jr., two years of age.

I will close wishing good luck to all the COMFORT sisters.

MRS. ALBERT F. PERRY.

ALBERT FRANKLIN PERRY, JR.

Good morning, Albert Franklin Perry, Jr., and you needn't look at us so reproachfully just because the camera man caught you before you had a chance to "dress up." We like you lots better just as you are even though we have a suspicion that you dressed in such a hurry that you got your dress on "hindside" 'fore and maybe missed a button or two but country boys just can't stop for such little things as buttons when they have chores and everything to do so early in the morning.—Ed.

COLORADO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I noticed in my last COMFORT two letters that spoke of starting a Home Fund for Uncle Charlie and now I am wondering if you would print in some number in the near future the amount that each state had subscribed up to a certain time. It would attract more attention and there would be the fun of each one trying to put her own state over the top and not allowing other states to outdo them.

Come on, COMFORT sisters, and do your share and let us present Uncle Charlie with money enough to build or buy a home for himself. And here's hoping the cousins will do their share, too.

Are my Colorado sisters going to help me put our state over the top?

Enclosed you will find one dollar for the home.

MRS. A. J. N.

Mrs. A. J. N.—All contributions to Uncle Charlie's Home Fund have been carefully recorded—in fact the account has been kept under his personal supervision—and although the amount of each contribution appears, the addresses of the contributors in many instances have not been noted, so that it would be difficult, if not impossible, now to give separately the respective amounts that have come from the several States. The following is Uncle Charlie's report of the totals:

"The following are the facts about the Home Fund. From Aug. 11, 1916, and up to date, Nov. 26, 1919 (three years and three and a half months), $2,958.79 have been contributed by 5,272 people. The last boost which resulted from the letters in the Sisters' Corner, in the September issue, brought in $125.58, and this amount was contributed by 283 people, and is included in the amount mentioned above. The fund falls far short of the amount requisite to buy any sort of a comfortable home in Brooklyn where he lives."

DAYTON, 134 Garfield St., OHIO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Uncle Charlie's Home Fund has come to life again and after reading the letters from Verne Ellis and J. Fred Macdonald I am so ashamed of myself and my thoughtless sisters that I will try immediately to atone for my neglect for that is what it is. I have been a reader of dear old COMFORT for lo, these many years and have always admired Uncle Charlie so much. When I think of all the young men he has inspired to do their part in this dreadful war I feel that I am a slacker. Now sisters, don't let the grass grow under your feet until you have done your share toward providing a home for one of God's good men.

I am seventy years old and my husband is eighty-five and has been totally blind for thirty-four years, but he keeps a little cigar and news-stand and is there every day at six o'clock in the morning. We are both well and are thankful to our dear Lord for all His blessings.

Now sisters, take this matter home and act accordingly; do it now.

Enclosed please find five dollars for dear Uncle Charlie.

MRS. MINA PARLETTE.

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

AN old gentleman of my acquaintance told me recently that, so far as he could see, the prune was the only article of food that had been improved upon in cooking since he was a boy, many years ago. While I didn't fully agree with him, my mind went back to the four or five stewed prunes, with watery prune juice, of former boarding house fame and I compared them with the various delectable ways they are prepared at the present time, a few of which are given below, and felt that he was right in that particular respect.—Ed.

PRUNES WITH RICE AND WHIPPED CREAM.—Cook rice twenty minutes, drain and put in top of double boiler with one cup of milk. Let cook half an hour. To serve, put in shallow dish with cooked prunes over top. Pour prune juice over rice. Sprinkle with chopped nuts and serve with whipped cream.

PRUNE PIE.—Steam the prunes until tender and then put through potato ricer. To one cup of prune pulp, add two well-beaten eggs, butter the size of a walnut, one half teaspoon each of ginger, cinnamon and nutmeg, and one half cup of sugar. More if necessary. Mix well and add two cups of milk heated nearly to the boiling point. Fill crust and bake in fairly hot oven.

PRUNE TAPIOCA.—Soak one half cup of tapioca in one and one half cups of cold water. Put one pound of cooked prunes into double boiler, add tapioca and cook one and one half hours. Serve with cream and sugar.

BARLEY FLOUR PIE CRUST.—One cup of barley flour, less than one quarter of a cup of shortening, and one third of a teaspoon of salt. With a knife cut the shortening into the flour, but do not make it pasty. Work in with the knife about three tablespoons of cold water. Use as little water as possible. Dust board with flour, and without kneading roll out the crust and line plate.

PRUNE PUDDING.—Melt three tablespoons of butter, add one half cup molasses, one half cup milk and one and two thirds cups of flour, mixed and sifted with one half teaspoon of soda and one quarter teaspoon each salt, cloves, cinnamon and nutmeg. To this add one pound of prunes that have been soaked and cut into small pieces. Turn into a buttered mould and let steam two hours. Serve with sauce made by creaming one half cup of butter and adding gradually three quarters cup of brown sugar. Flavor with one teaspoon of vanilla.

BAKED PRUNE PUDDING.—This is an excellent way to use up stale bread. Dry it in the oven until crisp. Roll and to every cup of bread-crumbs add one cup of cooked prunes, stoned and cut into small pieces, one quarter cup of sugar, one half teaspoon salt, one quarter teaspoon cinnamon, one tablespoon melted butter and two cups of milk. Mix well and bake. Serve with sauce given in recipe above.—WORCESTER READER, Mass.

RHUBARB AND PRUNE SAUCE.—Wash one cup of prunes and let soak in hot water two hours, taking care not to let them come to a boil. Remove prunes and take out pits, then put prunes back in juice and add two cups of rhubarb, cut into small pieces, one cup of sugar and cook in double boiler until rhubarb is tender. A few raisins added improve the flavor.

PRUNE JELLY.—Soak half a box of gelatine in one half cup of cold water until soft. Soak one pound of prunes in cold water over night and cook until tender. Drain, remove stones and cut into small pieces. There should be one pint of prune liquor, or add enough water to make it that quantity. Add one cup of sugar, one tablespoon lemon juice, the soaked gelatine; stir well and pour into mould. Serve with whipped cream.

STEWED PRUNES.—Wash and pick over prunes. Put in saucepan, cover with cold water and soak five hours. Cook until soft in same water. When nearly cooked add sugar or molasses to sweeten.

PRUNE FILLING FOR CAKE.—Put one cup of sugar and one third cup of boiling water into saucepan and boil until syrup will thread. Do not stir. Have white of egg beaten to stiff froth and pour syrup onto egg, beating until of the right consistency to spread. Flavor with one teaspoon of lemon juice. Before spreading on cake, add one cup of cooked prunes, cut into small pieces.

PRUNE PIE.—Wash one half pound of prunes and soak two hours in cold water. Cook in same water until soft. Remove stones, cut prunes in quarters and mix with one half cup sugar and two teaspoons lemon juice. Line pie plate with paste, cover with prunes, moisten with one tablespoon prune juice, add a few seeded raisins, dot with small pieces of butter and dredge with flour. Cover with upper crust and bake in a moderate oven.

SOUR CREAM CAKE.—One cup of sour cream, two eggs, one half teaspoon soda dissolved in sour cream, one cup sugar, two teaspoons baking powder, sifted with flour, one cup cooked, chopped prunes and one teaspoon of lemon extract. Bake half an hour in loaf or in layers.

PRUNE ROLL.—Beat whites of two eggs to a stiff froth, add yolks and beat. To this add one cup of sugar and stir all together with one cup of flour and one half cup boiling water and beat again. Now add one quarter teaspoon salt and one teaspoon baking powder. Flavor and beat well. Bake in quick oven, spread with mixture made of cooking prunes and raisins together to consistency of jelly and roll in a damp cloth. —MRS. C. HOPPE, Pomeroy, Wash.

PUFFED RICE AND PRUNES.—Heat your rice in the oven until it becomes a delicate brown. In the center of the platter pile up prunes that have been filled with whipped cream, surrounding them with the cream. The puffed rice should be used as the outer circle and is very much improved by the addition of the prunes and cream.—MARY HARROD NORTHEND, Salem, Mass.

CAKE WITH PRUNE FILLING.—One cup corn syrup, one tablespoon lard or any shortening, one cup of boiling water with one level teaspoon soda dissolved in it, one half teaspoon cinnamon and salt, one cup barley flour, two cups white flour with two teaspoons baking powder sifted with it. Mix and beat thoroughly. Do not have oven too hot as it burns easily. All white flour may be used.

FILLING.—One cup of cooked and chopped prunes, one half cup chopped raisins, one half cup corn syrup, one tablespoon flour, pinch of salt, and one half cup cold water. Mix thoroughly and cook in double boiler until thick enough to spread. Cool cake and filling before spreading.—MRS. LIZZIE LAWLEY, West Frankfort, Ill.

Driven Apart

by Julia Edwards

She plucked a bud from the roses, and fastened it to his lapel.

"I have her now!" he gloated "Stop me who can or dares."

Beryl, her lips moving voicelessly to frame a prayer, leaped out at the other side of the car.

"Neil, my husband! Where are you?"

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Nicholas Berdyne, past middle age, his face marred by dissipation, schemes with Hartley Trenwyck to win Beryl Grayson, whose father is dead. She is engaged to Neil Preston, who goes to Alaska in the interest of a mine owned by Grayson and which falls into Berdyne's hands. Neil Preston is reported dead by Dave Gorsline, who is hired by Berdyne to tell Beryl. In her sorrow and loss of wealth, she refuses continued aid from Berdyne. Mr. Jackman from Denver, wanting to repay a debt owed to Beryl's father, invites Beryl to his ranch, where she forms a friendship for Tonita, a beautiful Mexican girl, who advises her not to marry Berdyne through any mistaken idea of gratitude. Irma Lee, discarded by Berdyne, warns Beryl that he serves his own selfish purpose and that Neil Preston lives and is on his way to Jackman's Ranch. Berdyne, persistent that Beryl shall become his wife, Neil Preston, overhearing her denunciation of his baseness and treachery and refusing to marry him, confronts Berdyne who swears he will follow his trail. The day Beryl Grayson becomes Berdyne's wife, Morley Preston, opposed to Neil's marriage, will tender Trenwyck a check for five thousand dollars and Berdyne will give a like sum. He admits Beryl's trust in Jackson and that the letter written offering her the home was inspired by him, that he holds a heavy mortgage on the Jackman ranch, and with this knowledge they plot to separate the lovers who plan to be married the following day. Jackman, a tool in Berdyne's and Trenwyck's hands, drugs the wine which he gives Beryl when he drinks with her to her happiness, and she, feeling dizzy and faint, goes to her room and the door is locked. Neil Preston, returning for Beryl, meets Tonita. Approaching Jackman's house, an automobile is in waiting and a man with Beryl in his arms appears from the house and lifts her into the car. Preston strikes him down, and taking the auto, with Tonita, they make their escape through the night for San Francisco. Trenwyck advises Berdyne not to go too far.

CHAPTER X. (CONTINUED.)

He ceased abruptly, apparently thinking that he was going too far with his confidences. Trenwyck's eyes opened a little wider in the semi-darkness, and a half smile curled about his crafty lips. However, he did not press Berdyne for further information.

"Then Preston will take the girl north?"

"If I know him," said Berdyne, "he will not stop short of San Francisco. And he will not let any grass grow under his feet in seeking a minister. By Jove!" he exclaimed, under spell of a sudden thought, "I can send a telegraph message to all the towns between here and Frisco, telling the authorities to be on the lookout for a stolen automobile called the Red Flyer, and to arrest the man in charge of it. That's the idea, Trenwyck! I can foil Preston in the very midst of his triumph! Let us get back to San Jose as quickly as possible, and send the messages."

"It will not do, Berdyne," demurred Trenwyck.

"Why not?"

"If you have Preston arrested for the theft of your automobile, your dealings here will be aired, and not only you, but Jackman and I, will be caught in the net of the law. The move would prove a boomerang."

The logic of this appealed strongly to Berdyne. He had wealth, and wealth could do many things, but it could not save him from the consequences of his illegal attempts against the person of beautiful Beryl Grayson. It was a matter that had best not be aired in a court of law.

"Then what would you advise, Trenwyck?" Berdyne queried.

"There is a train out of San Jose that will get us into the Townsend Street station, in Frisco, at four in the morning. Let us catch that train. It may be," he added, grimly, "that we shall reach the city in time to greet Preston on his arrival. If you had some one there whom you could trust, some one who is not overscrupulous, you understand, that person could be set on the watch; then, in case Preston should reach his destination ahead of us, we might have some clue to work on."

"Gorsline," muttered Berdyne; "Gorsline is the man to help us now!"

"He is in San Francisco?" asked Trenwyck.

"Yes. When I departed from the city, to come here, I left him there. I had learned that Preston had returned from Alaska on the Argonaut, and when I hastened south, to be beforehand with my plans at Sunset Ranch, I gave instructions to my man Hargreaves to have Gorsline watch Preston and keep me informed of his movements."

"Then why did not Gorsline let you know that Preston was coming here?"

"He did; but I did not receive the telegram until after my visit to the ranch, this morning. It was put into my hands when I returned to San Jose, to wait for the Red Flyer and put it in readiness for the work I had in mind."

"Then let us make a quick return to San Jose," said the lawyer. "Before we take the train, you can send a telegram to Gorsline."

Thus the plotters agreed between themselves, and Jackman furnished a buggy, two draft horses, and a driver to convey the two men to San Jose.

In due course, the wealthy villain and his guileful henchman were set down at the San Jose railroad station, with still an hour or more before their train should leave. Berdyne's telegram to his hired ally in San Francisco merely stated that "the man from Alaska" had made off with the Red Flyer, ostensibly bound for the city, requested that Gorsline do what he could to locate him, and meet the four-o'clock train in the Townsend Street station to report.

The train was late, from some cause, and Berdyne consulted his gold watch time and again. It was a quarter to five when the train lagged into the railroad station that fateful but beautiful morning, and the two scheming rogues descended to the platform.

At the great iron gate through which the arriving passengers passed, a burly, vicious-looking man was waiting. As Berdyne and Trenwyck came through the gate the waiting rascal caught sight of them and stepped apart. The other two followed him.

"Well, Gorsline?" were Berdyne's first impatient words.

"The cove ye're lookin' for is in town, all right," said Gorsline, with a cunning leer; and a fierce joy shot through Berdyne's breast. "Leastways," the fellow added, "I've found the automobile, and, if Preston stole it, he can't be a great ways off."

"Luck is with us!" muttered Trenwyck.

"It wasn't luck altogether," grunted Gorsline. "When Hargreaves told me to watch Preston, I picked him up at a hotel on Market Street, near the Ferry Buildin', an' he went callin' two or three times at a house in Pine Street. First thing I done, when I got that telegram last night, was to go to the hotel. Our man wasn't there; then I nosed around the house in Pine Street. Didn't expect to have much luck, 'cause lookin' for a feller in Frisco is about like huntin' for a needle in a haystack—'specially when it's night, an' you're in a hurry; but the last time I went to that Pine Street house, about half an hour ago, there was the Red Flyer in front. I knowed this train was late, havin' found out about it over the telephone. As it was, I had to move lively to get here."

"Who lives in the house, Gorsline?" queried Berdyne. "Do you know?"

"A reverend gent by the name o' Bickerdyke."

"A minister!" exclaimed Berdyne, with a meaning glance at Trenwyck.

"That's what."

"We'll have to hurry," said Berdyne, starting for the street.

"What can we do?" demurred the lawyer, hastening along at Berdyne's side. "We're not at Sunset Ranch now, Nick. This is a big city, and the police will make things warm for us if we go too far."

"I shall claim to be the girl's guardian, and forbid the marriage—if we are in time; if the marriage has already been performed, I shall——"

Berdyne paused, his eyes smouldering with a desperate resolve.

"Well," he added, as he gained the sidewalk and hailed a taxicab, "I am not to be foiled this time. Gorsline is with me, and he will do whatever I tell him."

The taxicab drew up alongside the curb.

"Ride with the chauffeur," said Berdyne, to the man from the Barbary Coast, "and tell him where to go. Double fare for double speed."

With that he opened the cab door, pushed Trenwyck inside, stepped in himself, drew the door shut, and the motor rolled away.

It was ten minutes after five when Berdyne, Trenwyck and Gorsline jumped to the sidewalk in front of a small frame residence. The Red Flyer was still at the curb.

For the most part, the great, pleasure-loving city was still asleep, all unconscious of the doom whose approach could be numbered by pulsebeats, by the ticking seconds of a watch.

It was a rarely beautiful morning; and yet fate shuddered in the balmy air:

As though an earthquake smacks its mumbling lips
O'er the thick-peopled city.

CHAPTER XI.

RIVEN ASUNDER.

"My bride-to-be, my dearest love, we have reached the end of our journey. Thank Heaven! we are in San Francisco, and here is the home of the good minister who is to make you mine forever and a day."

Both Beryl and Tonita, cruelly worn by the events of the preceding day and evening, had slept on the cushions of the automobile during the latter part of their night ride. Well, indeed, was it for them that they were able to snatch even this small amount of rest, to buoy them up against the trials that lay before them.

Neil, stooping over Beryl, awakened her with tender words. Both girls were instantly wide awake.

"Why did you let us sleep, dearest?" cried Beryl. "It must have been very lonely for you."

"Lonely," he echoed, "when it was my happiness to keep watch and ward over such lovely creatures as you and Tonita?"

"Flatterer!" murmured Beryl. "But must we go into the house as we are, dear?" she added, with a fresh quiver of dismay. "Is there no time for me to secure something to wear that will be more in keeping with——"

He smothered the words with a kiss.

"I feel that I cannot delay one single moment, my darling. Even as we speak, Berdyne, with all his hateful cunning, may be in pursuit of us. The safest and surest way to defeat his base schemes is to carry out our plans at once. Is it not so, Tonita?" and he turned to the Mexicana.

"You speak truly, senor," she returned, in her soft, rippling voice.

He assisted them to alight, and they stood for a few moments on the walk beside the car, enjoying the freshness of the morning air.

"San Francisco," said Neil, "does not often have such mornings as this—clear, bright, sunny, the bay soft and sparkling, not a trace of fog, and the air trembling with a hint of spring! It is an omen, my heart's own!"

"Happy is the bride that the sun shines on," caroled Tonita, brushing her lips against Beryl's velvety cheek. "It is early for a bridal; and everything, even to our own inappropriate gowns, tinges the event with romance. It seems," she added, with a little spasm of ecstasy, "almost like an elopement!"

Beryl echoed Tonita's laugh with a soulful happiness there was no mistaking; then both girls followed Neil, who had mounted the steps to the house door. The good rector must have been sound asleep, for it took several rings of the bell to bring him to the entrance. He came, in gown and slippers, a grave, elderly, gentle-faced man, and cried out in astonishment at sight of Neil and the two fair ones beside him.

"Why, Neil!" he exclaimed. "What brings you to my home so early?"

"An affair of some importance, reverend sir," answered Neil. "I would have you unite me to the woman of my choice."

"A marriage!" he murmured, his wondering eyes passing from Beryl to Tonita. "Ah, he added, with a troubled look, "there is some mystery here!"

"Let us in, sir," said Neil, "and I will explain."

"Pardon me!" The rector drew back and held the door wide.

Neil presented his two companions, as soon as they were all in the hall, and noted with loving exultation how the good man's eyes rested with ill-concealed admiration on the lovely face of Beryl. The girls were given kindly greeting, and shown to chairs in the parlor, while Neil in another room, explained matters to the minister's satisfaction.

The minister aroused his daughter, who served as his housekeeper, and she led the girls to an apartment on the second floor, where a few hasty preparations were made for the bridal.

Beryl was back in the parlor some minutes before Tonita and Miss Bickerdyke. In spite of her plain house dress, the little bride was never more bewitchingly lovely. In her hands she carried a bouquet of La France roses.

"My pearl! My heart's idol!" cried Neil, his deep love springing instinctively from his lips. His arms opened, and Beryl nestled closely in his strong embrace. "I can hardly realize," he went on, gazing down into her violet eyes, "that at last you are to be mine! At last, after the weary months of separation, we are to be united, never again to part."

His love was shining in his glance, and it glorified his handsome face. A sigh of rapture, a sigh that was half a sob, rose to Beryl's lips. Bowing his head, he kissed her.

"The past is gone, sweetheart," said Beryl; "let us live in the present and the future!"

"The present is all the more bright by contrast with the past, my darling," he murmured.

"When was it you first began to love me, dear?" she asked, seeking to go back to those long-gone Denver days, when first they met. Those days were in the past, too, although sorrow bridged them to the present.

"The moment my eyes first rested upon your beautiful face, dearest," he answered; "I loved you from that moment and would have dared death itself for your sweet smile."

She plucked a bud from the roses, and fastened it to his lapel.

"Miss Bickerdyke gave me these," she said, nestling her blushing face in the blossoms. "She wore them at the opera last night. She would have loaned me a gown for the occasion," Beryl said, with a sweet smile, "but I told her that I preferred to go to you as I am."

"My precious one," he murmured. "Silks and satins, veils and orange blossoms are nothing to the hearts that love."

At that moment Tonita and Miss Bickerdyke entered the room, and presently, in full robes, came the rector.

"If you are ready, my children," said he gently.

Then they stood before him, with the other two on either side. The sun, shining through a nearby window, tangled its beams in Beryl's hair, kissing it into gold.

In deep, solemn tones the minister pronounced the beautiful service, and, at the fitting moment, Neil placed a magnificent gem on Beryl's finger. It was not the wedding ring he had intended to use, but another, which he had purchased for Beryl and intended to give her later. The haste of the preceding hours, however, had left him no alternative.

The last words were hardly said, and Neil had barely released his joyful bride from his arms, when an emphatic summons fell on the hall door.

"Who can that be?" murmured the minister.

A suspicion rushed through Neil's brain, a suspicion that was reflected in Beryl's startled face, and turned it pale.

"Courage, darling," Neil said reassuringly; "we have no one to fear now."

"It is Senor Berdyne!" came breathlessly from Tonita, who had stolen a glance from the window.

Neil straightened his supple, manly form.

"The door is locked against that scheming scoundrel!" exclaimed he, starting across the room. "Yet," he went on, with a flash of anger, "I will speak to him; I will tell him how vain are his despicable plots, and that now Beryl and I are man and wife!"

"Neil," called Beryl, stretching out her hands appealingly, as though she would restrain him and keep him from threatening danger, "my love, my husband!"

"Hush, dearest!" he answered. "I must have a word with that man."

But the word was never spoken. Ere Neil could gain the hall, in a flash, and by a process swift as thought, came chaos!

Those in the little parlor had but time to exchange one agonized, bewildered look. That moment of rigid suspense ended, a thunderous roar sounded in their ears; there was a sickening swirl of motion, the floor heaved under their feet, the walls swayed, the ceiling appeared to crack apart. Furniture crashed, books were thrown from their shelves, a piano in one corner glided half across the room and back again, sounding a jumble of shrill, discordant notes.

Then came a wild, brain-racking crash. A great gap appeared above as the bricks of a chimney tore their way through the roof and ceiling into the very room where the bridal party stood.

A despairing cry was wrenched from Neil's lips, and he reeled and fell prostrate. A scream burst from Beryl. She would have hurled herself upon her husband's form had not the door been broken open, and Berdyne, leaping in, caught her up in his strong arms. Despite the roaring and grinding of the earthquake, the thunder of falling chimneys and walls, the screams of women and children, Berdyne's evil spirit was in no wise dismayed.

"I have her now!" he gloated, his husky voice rising high over the tumult. "Stop me who can, or dares!"

Another moment and he had passed from the room like an evil specter, bearing the hapless Beryl with him.

CHAPTER XII.

WEDDED AND PARTED.

The dark soul of Nicholas Berdyne rose superior to that awful situation. Although walls crumbled about him, towers tottered and fell, and the very pavement tilted and heaved beneath his feet, his exultation left no room for fear.

As he descended the steps of the minister's home the cries of women came from near and far. A whitish-yellow dust hung over the street like a fog, and through it he caught glimpses of disheveled forms fleeing for life from the racked buildings.

At first, scream after scream had come from the lips of poor, hapless Beryl. Tortured on account of her husband, whom she had seen stricken down before her very eyes, dazed by the fury of the visitation of nature's forces, and distraught by the coming of Berdyne, she had swooned ere her bearer had passed the entrance and begun descending the steps.

In that hour of chaos and confusion there was none to question the strong man's right to bear his victim from the house. There were others, who still kept their heads, assisting the maimed and injured to places of safety. Had those others time or thought for question, their curiosity could have been easily parried. But every refugee was intensely occupied with his own immediate affairs.

Blinded and choked by the dust, Berdyne peered toward the curb. But one vehicle remained there, and that was the automobile. Near it he saw a figure, but whether it was Trenwyck or Gorsline he could not tell from that distance. As he pushed forward another form raced out of the whitish-yellow pall toward the man by the automobile.

"I want that automobile!" shouted the distracted voice of the man who had rushed at the Red Flyer; "my wife is injured, perhaps dying!

A Bottle Like This In Each Package

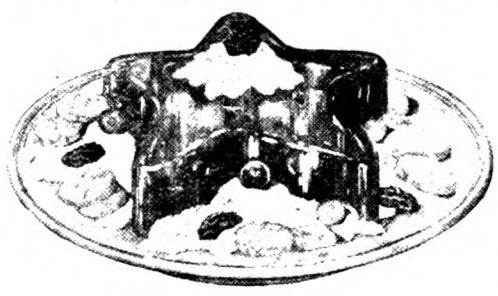
These Rich Fruit Juices

In Condensed Form—in Bottles—Come in Jiffy-Jell Desserts

Millions are now serving a new-grade quick gelatine dessert. If you are not, we urge you to try it now.

Jiffy-Jell contains real fruit juices, in liquid form, condensed. There's a bottle in each package.

We crush the fruit, condense the juice and seal it up in glass. So you get the real fruit—not an artificial flavor—in Jiffy-Jell desserts.



The fruit is abundant. For instance, we use half a pineapple to flavor a pint dessert. And we use lemon or grape to acidulate it. So Jiffy-Jell tastes as though filled with fruit. It has fruit virtues and delights.

You Need Fruit

Everybody needs fruit daily. It is rich in earthy salts. The lack of it leads to many ill conditions.

Mere flavors will not do. Fresh fruits and canned fruits are expensive. So Jiffy-Jell is an essential in these winter months.

It costs a trifle. One package serves six people in mold form, or twelve if you whip the jell. They get a real-fruit dainty, rich in fruit, for less than the fruit alone would cost you if you made it.

Dessert for Six
A real-fruit dessert made with one package of Jiffy-Jell and costing a few cents

Made in an Instant

Jiffy-Jell comes ready-sweetened and acidulated. Simply add boiling water, as per directions, then the fruit-juice from the vial, and let cool.

In this way, eight of the finest fruits are ever at your call.

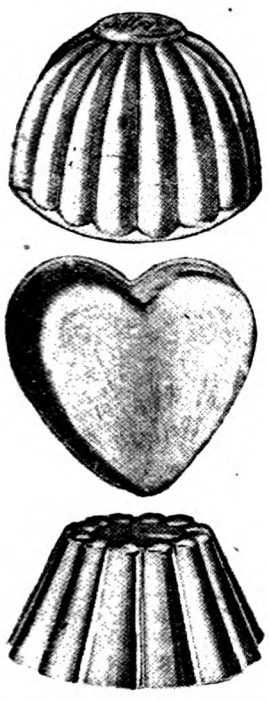
Zestful Salads Also

Lime-fruit Jiffy-Jell makes a tart, green salad jell. Serve with your salad, or mix the salad in and make a loaf. Or mix in meat scraps and make a zestful meat loaf.

Mint Jiffy-Jell has a bottle of mint-leaf essence. Serve with hot or cold meats, or as a side dish.

We Pay You to Try Them

We offer these molds to induce you to try a few flavors. Try Loganberry, Pineapple, Lime and Mint, also others that you like.



Try them now while this offer is open. They will show you how to make countless dinners more healthful and delightful. Cut out the coupon so you won't forget.

Cubby Bear Sees a Flying Machine

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

SHINYBLACK CROW flew down into the forest in a state of great excitement.

Cubby Bear and Racky Coon were marking out a hopscotch diagram on the smooth ground in front of Bunny Rabbit's house. Wollie Woodchuck sat on the ground waiting until the game should be ready, and Dr. Squilly Porcupine, medicine case in hand, stood watching them, and wishing he did not feel it beneath him to play hopscotch with them.

"Come, quick, quick!" called Shinyblack Crow. "Come to the clearing by the big pine tree, where you can get a better view. Run on ahead of me, while I tell some of the others!"

"A better view of what?" asked Cubby Bear.

"Why, where are your ears?" asked Shinyblack Crow. "Haven't you heard that roaring, rattling sound in the sky for the last ten minutes?"

"I—didn't notice," faltered Cubby Bear. "We were talking."

"I heard it," said Wollie Woodchuck lazily, "but I thought it was maybe just an earthquake or something."

"What is it?" asked Dr. Squilly.

"Why, a great, gay-colored creature up in the sky, that flies this way and that, up and down, and—you may not believe me, but it turns over and over in the air without falling! I don't know what to make of it! Why don't you start for the clearing? It may go away soon! If it flies very low, run for your homes, for a man is flying with it! I went near enough to it to see him."

They started off without more ado, only stopping at Mamma Bruin's house to take her along with them.

The strange, rattling noise was growing louder.

"Oh, oh, I see it!" cried Cubby Bear, suddenly, pointing upward.

A strange creature it was, indeed, sailing gracefully through the air, far above them.

"It looks like a giant dragon-fly!" said Mamma Bruin.

"It's song is not musical," said Wollie Woodchuck, yawning. "I would far rather hear Robbie Reddie." Wollie lay down on his back, and stretched out comfortably, where he could watch the flying monster at ease.

One by one the little woods people came hurrying into the clearing—Busy Beaver, Brother Binny Beaver, Minnie Mink, Foxy Reynard, Woozie Weasel, Chirpy Chipmunk, and others, all curious to see the wonderful sight.

"Look at him, look at him!" shouted Brother Binny Beaver, tossing high his hat in his excitement. "Turning right over, upside down! He'll fall! He can never keep his balance!"

But the monster did not fall. Instead, it righted itself gracefully, then tilted slowly over sideways until it had turned again completely.

"What is that black speck up there in the sky?" asked Mamma Bruin.

"I have been wondering, myself," answered Shinyblack Crow, "but cannot quite make out. I'm going up and see."

"Do not go too near," warned Cubby Bear, as Shinyblack Crow spread his black wings for flight.

He soon came down again, quite breathless with the news he had to tell.

"It is Edric Eagle!" he said.

"Edric Eagle!" repeated the others.

This was a wonder, indeed! For Edric Eagle, aged, stern, and keeping quite aloof from all companionship, lived in his rocky eyrie on the heights of a distant mountain, and few of the little woods people had ever seen him.

"What is he here for?" asked Cubby Bear.

"He does not mean to be outdone by anything that flies!" said Shinyblack Crow. "See how far above the new monster he is!"

"He is coming lower! Look, you can see now that he is a bird, with wings."

Chirpy Chipmunk stretched his tiny paws aloft.

"Oh, that I, too, could fly!" he cried. "I would like to be up there, with the man, in the flying monster!"

"Then you would only fall, and be killed," Busy Beaver told him. "You are much better off where you are."

"No man can be up there," declared Foxy Reynard, "for a man would fall, too, when that great flying thing turns upside down. A man can do wonderful things, I know, but even he cannot stand on his head in the air!"

Shinyblack Crow's feathers were ruffling, and he took a defiant step toward Foxy.

"A man is up there!" he said firmly. "Did I not tell you I saw him?"

Foxy Reynard backed away, but muttered to Woozie Weasel, "I can keep my own opinion, I suppose."

Both the flying machine and Edric Eagle were nearer the watching crowd. Whatever the airplane did, the huge bird tried to do, too—rising straight up, swooping suddenly lower, darting straight ahead.

Never had Cubby Bear been so excited since the night of the merry-go-round.

"Ha!" shouted Squilly Porcupine, "Edric will have to give up now! The thing is getting ready to turn another summersault, and you'll see Mr. Eagle flying off home to hide his head."

"HE IS COMING LOWER! LOOK, YOU CAN SEE NOW THAT HE IS A BIRD WITH WINGS."

"He'll never give up if it kills him," murmured Tillie Turtle, sagely; "I've heard my mother tell how proud he is, and how determined. She knew him well. Stubborn—why, nothing could compare with him! I've no doubt he can sail topsy-turvy if he likes."

But no one paid any attention to what Tillie was saying.

The airplane, still keeping up its loud rattle, headed straight downward, turned over slowly, and came upright again.

Then, downward pointed Edric Eagle's curved beak. With a mighty effort he lurched over on his back.

"Good for Edric Eagle! Hurrah!" cried Racky Coon, while Mamma Bruin snatched off her apron and waved it wildly in the air.

But the eagle could not right himself as the airplane had done.

"He's falling!" shrieked Tillie Turtle, and stretched up her small, dark claws as if to catch him.

"Alas it was true! Straight downward plunged the mighty bird.

"The rockery!" gasped Shinyblack Crow, who, poised in air, saw the danger that threatened.

The rockery was not far from the pine tree clearing—a large, rock-covered place where scarcely a blade of grass or weed could find a foothold.

Away the animals hurried through the bushes, while the birds flew lightly overhead. The roar of the airplane grew fainter, as it went flying away into the distance.

They found poor Edric Eagle, his stately grandeur gone, lying limp and helpless among the rocks.

Dr. Squilly Porcupine hurriedly scrambled over the rocks to the fallen eagle, while the others crowded around.

"Stand back," ordered Squilly, sharply. Then he looked his patient over carefully.

"I am glad to tell you," he said, after what seemed a long time to the waiting crowd, "that Mr. Eagle is still alive. His wing is broken, and he is badly bruised, but he will soon be himself again. Where can we take him?"

"To my house," offered Mamma Bruin. "There is no other place large enough."

With Mamma Bruin's apron for a stretcher, Edric Eagle was carefully carried through the woods by Busy Beaver, Brother Binny Beaver, Mamma Bruin and Cubby Bear, while the others followed in solemn procession.

Edric Eagle awoke lying on Cubby Bear's bed. He was grim and silent at first, but such kindness as Mamma Bruin and Cubby Bear showed him, yes, and old Grandma Bear, too, quite won his friendship.

"Say nothing to him about his fall, Cubby Bear," kind Mamma Bruin said. "He is proud, and would not like to be reminded of his failure."

Edric told Cubby Bear stories of his long, lonely life among the lofty crags of his mountain home. How day after day he sat in stately dignity, breathing the high, pure air, rejoicing in the fierce storms that swept the mountain, the beautiful dawns and sunsets.

"Lesser mountains and hills I can look down upon," he said, "rivers and valleys, lakes, forests and towns—and I am king of them all. Sometimes the clouds gather around my mountain top—the cool, gray clouds—and sometimes I am above the clouds, and watch the storm below me. I love the thunder storms, with the bright flashes, the zigzagging streaks of lightning, and the sound of the thunder rolling and crashing about me."

The broken wing was not long in healing, and Edric Eagle rejoiced as each new day brought back his strength. Few callers came, for Cubby's friends feared the great bird, with his keen eyes and silent ways, but Dr. Squilly called daily.

"I shall leave you tomorrow," said Edric one day.

Squilly looked anxious. "No, no," he said, "your broken wing is not strong enough yet for such a flight."

"I shall start," said the eagle, "and go as I can. I stifle here in the lowlands. I need the bracing air of the heights."

So the next day he bade them all good by.

"I shall not forget you, Cubby Bear," he said, "and some day we shall meet again."

Then he started on his homeward journey, taking short flights, with long rests between; a lonely figure, going to his lonely home.

"I am sorry he was hurt," said Cubby Bear to Mamma Bruin as they watched him go, "but I am glad, glad, to have another friend."

WHILE you are climbing up onto my lap, I will wish you a sane and sensible New Year. If any of you have Bolshevist tendencies don't display them around here unless you want to interview the undertaker.

The Omaha saturnalia of mob violence and bloody beastliness I've not yet had a chance to comment on, but it is all of a piece with what is going on, or would be going on, if force did not hold out its restraining hand all over the country. I told you recently that humanity was sick. The sickness has passed off, now the world is crazy, lawless and vile. At least half, however, of the American people are sane, sensible and law abiding. They are the backbone of our nation but if they go to sleep in this hour of world crisis, as good American people generally do, while the criminal elements of society on the other hand, like the Kaiser and his gang, are ever awake, ever plotting, then you might just as well have stayed out of France, saved the splendid lives you sacrificed and submitted to the tyranny of the Prussian, for I tell you right now, you would have had a better chance under the mailed fist of the Hohenzollern than you will ever have under the rule of the mob, the criminal, and the degenerate; for what these beasts are capable of doing is amply demonstrated by what happened on that terrible night in Omaha when the fiends broke loose and tore everything to pieces. If you think for one moment that that mob of criminals had no other thought in mind than the mere lynching of a negro murderer, you are mightily mistaken. That was a mere incident, simply an excuse to let loose the flood-gates of their devilish lust for blood and destruction. Deep down in the best of every man there is a remnant of the barbarian from whom we are descended. You saw that barbarism let loose like a flood of lava when the Hun threw off his thin veneer of decency and civilization, and burned, slew, ravished, pillaged and plundered everybody and everything in his path; but even the Prussian hordes were under the command of their officers, and would probably have been willing to have made peace, had they got the terms they wanted, terrible as those terms would have been. But the mob is under no control. You cannot treat with or reason with it for it is comprised of frenzied fools, crazy lunatics, impelled by every passion that is vile, horrible and criminal. All you can do with it is to shoot it up—destroy it before it destroys you. The mob is the abysmal beast, a monster masquerading in human form, whose appetite for blood is unquenchable. To think that we have reared this beast in our bosom is horrible to think of. In the days of old, when fighting and murder were man's chief occupation, mob violence was to be expected. But there is absolutely no excuse for such outbursts today, except that men want to let the beast within them get the upper hand and wallow in the muck and mire like swine. Now listen to what the editor of the Omaha World-Herald has to say upon this subject. His words of fire ought to burn deep into every heart that is human:

"There is the rule of the jungle in this world, and there is the rule of the law. Under jungle rule no man's life is safe, no man's wife, no man's mother, sister, children, home, liberty, rights, property. Under the rule of law, protection is provided for all these. Omaha was humiliated and disgraced by a monstrous object-lesson of what jungle rule means. The lack of efficient government in Omaha, the lack of government foresight and sagacity and energy, made the exhibition possible. It was provided by a few hundred hoodlums, most of them mere boys, organized as a wolf pack is organized, inflamed by the spirit of anarchy and license, of plunder and destruction. Ten thousand or more good citizens, without leadership, without organization, without public authority to organize for the anticipated emergency, were obliged to stand as onlookers, shamed in their hearts, and witness the hideous orgy of lawlessness. It would be impossible to speak too strongly in condemnation of the rioters or in the uncompromising demand for their stern and swift punishment whoever they may be, wherever they may be found. They not only foully murdered a negro they believed to be guilty. They brutally maltreated and attempted to murder other negroes whom they knew to be innocent. They tried to lynch the mayor. They wantonly pillaged stores and destroyed property. They burned the courthouse. In the sheer spirit of anarchy, they pulled valuable records from their steel filing-cases, saturated them in gasolene, and burned them. They burned police conveyances and cut the fire hose, inviting the destruction by fire of the entire city. Their actions were wholly vile, wholly evil and malignantly dangerous. There is not one of them but should be sent for a long term to state prison. We have had an experience with lawlessness. We have seen what it is. We have seen how it works. We have felt, however briefly, the fetid breath of anarchy on our cheeks. We have experienced the cold chill of fear which it arouses. We have seen as in a nightmare, its awful possibilities. We have learned how frail is the barrier which divides civilization from the primal jungle—and we have been given to see clearly what that barrier is. It is the Law! It is the might of the Law, wisely and fearlessly administered! It is respect for and obedience to the Law on the part of the members of society! When these things fail us, all things fail. When these are lost, all will be lost. May the lesson sink deep."

The Omaha incident is all a part of a carefully prepared plan of the disgruntled, the ugly, the vicious, the criminal, the depraved, the degenerate, to destroy our existing social order and replace it with a dictatorship of thugs, felons and gun-men such as exists in Russia. I talked preparedness to you for years, but most of you laughed in my face. You turned a deaf ear, believing that nothing could happen to you, until the Kaiser had his sword at your throats. Not until the draft call came and the President threw his idealism aside and said "Force! Force! Force! without stint!" did you wake up. If you had only awakened a couple of years earlier, the world would not be a jungle today, loaded with debt, ravaged by disease, thousands of our best doomed to lives of misery, blinded, gassed and condemned to unspeakable torture; Russia would be a republic instead of a slaughter house and bughouse, and you would not be menaced by the red ruin of anarchy which is now knocking at every door in the land. Those incarnate fiends, Lenine and Trotzky, with their propaganda are fooling the honest dub and inciting the crack-brained to deeds of violence the world over. By a process of boring from within, their paid agents are disrupting the labor unions, driving men mad with their devilish doctrines. In the first nine months of 1919 we had three thousand strikes. Most of these strikes were caused by the Red element who defied the leaders of their organizations. Those who struck, with rare exceptions, were not striking for better conditions of living, for the billions that have been spent during the war have simply flooded the country with money and labor is getting not only its share but often more than it knows how to spend sanely and sensibly. The extreme radicals, who are just plain Bolshevists, will tell you that every strike is simply another blow at American ideals, institutions, principles and government, and everyone who is not fighting these red terrorists is consciously or unconsciously aiding them. We have enough laws to make these rats run into their holes and stay there for all eternity, but these laws are so laxly enforced that these vermin defy and laugh at them. On every street corner in every big city in the land, these rascals dispense their venomous red dope, which the low-brows and gullible eagerly swallow. They who make coalbins out of their bathtubs and chicken coops of their parlors, defy the police and parade our streets, carrying banners inscribed: "Deport us to Russia where there is freedom!" It is to Russia they'd go in a hurry if I were running things, and there they'd find hell and tyranny and no freedom. Nothing satisfies the foreigner in America. The Jew who has been treated like a wild beast in Russia, gathers here in his ghettoes by the thousands, and though he has prospered, plots the destruction of our institutions. He, like others of his kind, wants to alter and run everything to suit himself. Other nationalities who are so powerful politically that I dare not even mention their names, are doing the same thing, and you must be blind indeed if you do not know who they are and what their purpose is.

The Omaha editor says there was lack of efficient government. Ah! there the gentleman put his finger on the crux of the whole trouble. The lack of efficiency in government, the lack of law enforcement, are all due to rotten politics. Politicians cannot hold jobs without votes and to get votes they are ready to sell their souls, to make law a farce and cultivate the vilest elements of our population. As I write, Congress, instead of appealing to the best elements in American life is reaching out for the votes of men who cheered with joy when the Lusitania was sunk, and danced with delight when your sons were shot and gassed. There are other arrogant racial groups filling the land with their raucous yaps and to curry favor with these groups politicians have for a long time been attacking the nations who were associated with us in this war, so as to please the voters back home. What utter folly! Meanwhile the strikes go on and the higher the wage the smaller the product. People want the low prices of 1914 and the high wages of 1920 and the poor idiots who are simply cutting their own throats, swear they will go Bolshevik if they don't get what they want. The fact is, people have become so pleasure crazy and so enamored of loafing and high living, they won't work at any price. Lenine found that out in Russia and he quickly solved the problem as a dictator can solve anything, by turning guns on the loafers and shooting them back into the factories. Remember every wage boost is a price boost, and not until the world creates what war has destroyed can things get back to normal. Only fools want to do the dog act and chase their own tails. Wealth is created by work, not by theorizing.

Now let me suggest that the foreign trouble-makers who only came here to rake in their pile and to use us as a convenience, and also the agitators and red rascals who plot but never work, be rounded up and deported. If fifty-thousand of these vermin were sent kiting home, the balance would be as meek as lambs. We've fooled with these scamps too long, the time has come for a show-down between foreigners and Americans. A cancer is growing in our midst that will destroy us, even as the Hun would have destroyed us, and that cancer has got to be cut out—there is no other way. The doctrine of these terrorists is force, as is the doctrine of every criminal and degenerate. Let your answer, too, be force, give them a dose of their ow medicine until they squeal for mercy. Have a machine-gun mounted on a motor lorry in the back yard of every courthouse of every city of any considerable size, and some that are not considerable. That howling mob in Omaha would have melted away like ice cream at a church social if they had had to face machine-guns. It is time that Uncle Sam ceased being Uncle Sham and Uncle Clam and woke up and applied the big stick to the dastards, who, because we are free-and-easy going and allow people to do much as they like, think they can stand us on our heads. If the law were strictly enforced, these impudent rascals would respect us, crawl into their holes and behave. We are not willing and will not permit alien plotters or home-bred soreheads to turn this country into a jungle. Now let all good citizens combine and organize. Evil has declared war to the death on good and the fight is on. Some of you may think I am hard on men simply because they are foreigners or of foreign parentage. But let me tell you I would rather have one wideawake, patriotic American of foreign birth, who keenly appreciates the advantages this country offers him and who is loyal and true to the principles of our government, than a thousand sleepy-headed, indifferent, half-baked Americans, who can trace their ancestry back to '76. You have had the Kaiser and you have had the flu, now you are threatened with the red terror, and you must fight the last to the death as you fought the other two. The art of being kind would save the world, but kindness is wasted on bums and anarchists. The noble art of being blind, alas, is the only art the average American seems to understand, and that art, if persisted in, will destroy us. The Hun is no longer without, he is within and far more dangerous than the Hun we fought across the sea, because he wears no uniform and is hard to detect, and, like a plague, he infests every corner of the land. You must destroy him or he will destroy you, your home and your children, for he is only a gorilla in human form. Make your lawmakers throw these anarchists out or elect men who will do it. We have played too long, talked too much. Now is the time for action. You can't let George do it, this is a job you must attend to yourself or perish. God speed your work or America is lost. P. S. The Rochester Herald says: "Almost a year since the armistice was signed and the only democratic nation on earth still making a fool of itself." For pity's sake quit fooling and go to work.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers, and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk covers, either one for a club of three subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the picture book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

MOULTON, R. R. 5, ALA.

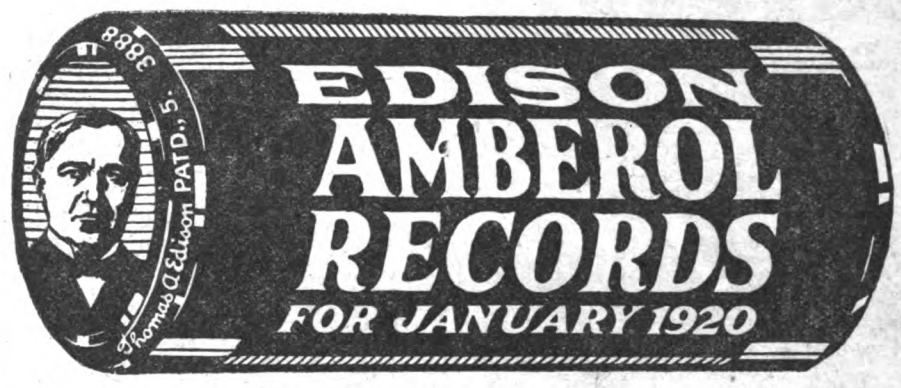
DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am certainly proud that I live in the good old U. S. A., for I think it is the grandest place on earth, and Moulton, Lawrence County, the grandest place of all. The County high school is situated at this place, which I have so long attended, this being my fifth year. I am in the senior class with sixteen other classmates, which I am deeply in love with—twelve girls and five boys. I am also a member of the Lee Society, there being two rival societies, the Lee and the K. W. G. Have always lived and worked on the farm and am proud of it. We have been readers of COMFORT for years and it certainly is a comfort. I want to read the book, "The Trial of the Lonesome Pine." Will return when read and pay postage. Let's all live a life that is worth living while we can, and we can if we but listen to the dictates of our own conscience.

ELIZABETH RYLANT.

Am glad to meet with a young lady who is proud to live in the U. S. A. A lot of lunatics and cranks seem to have got tired of this country, though they came here broke and now have money to burn. There is nothing in the U. S. the Bolshevist soreheads seem to like. But here's the funny thing, when they are gathered in by the police and threatened with deportation, they have forty-six legal societies, many of them financed by wealthy highbrows and crack-brained dreamers ready to hire the best legal talent to keep these vermin from being deported. I think I told you some time ago of sixty-eight of these rascals being rounded up in Seattle and one or two other places in the U. S. and brought here to Ellis Island, N. Y., for deportation. Now it turns out that only eight of these gentlemen are to be deported, or have been deported; the other sixty have been turned loose on us to work more devilment. In reading accounts of the Seattle Bolshevist upheaval which was squelched by Ole Hanson, one got the impression that every "Red" in all the gang who planned and carried out that effort to overturn the government by force, was rounded up and being sent east for deportation. The chief firebrand in this assault on our institutions was, of course, a Russian Jew with an English name. A price was offered for his capture, and the whole country was being scoured in an effort to locate him. Now I discover that this same red-eyed rascal is at liberty and stirring up more trouble. No wonder Senator Poindexter, on October 14, offered a resolution in the Senate requesting the Attorney General to advise that body why the Department of Justice has failed to take legal proceedings for the arrest and deportation of aliens who have preached anarchy and sedition and have openly advocated the unlawful destruction of industries, the destruction of property in pursuance of a deliberate plan and purpose to destroy and impede business essential to the propsperity and life of the community. Our grand old Uncle Sam today reminds me of a soldier who has been in the trenches and is smothered with cooties and is too lazy or indifferent or too fond of the cooties to submit to a delousing process. Oh, Lord, wouldn't I like to do that job for Uncle Sam! He does not know how to do it for himself but I know who the cooties are and how to get them. So you are deeply in love with your sixteen classmates, of whom (not of which) five are boys. Loving five boys all at once is going some. Even one is too much for a young lady of your age. Glad you are a member of the Lee Society, but keep away from the K. W. G.'s, as I understand that means Kaiser Wilhelm's Germans, and they have got to behave themselves and become Americanized, in this country at least, if they ever want to be friends of ours. I'm sorry to hear you are putting the lonesome pine on trial. I don't know what the lonesome pine has done, but, anyhow, if it is put in jail it will receive the same treatment accorded the other Bolsheviks and trouble makers for the last few years. It will be jailed one day and let out on bail for a thousand years the next. Billy the Goat has written a song which is dedicated to the Kaiser, entitled: "The Trial of the Lonesome Swine." I presume that Billy refers to the gentleman who was known as the Beast of Berlin. Don't stray far from the lonesome pine for if the Bolsheviki and the I. W. W. get the upper hand, it will be expedient for you, if you value your safety, to climb into the top branches and hide.

GASTONIA, N. C.



DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

The letters in your corner are just fine and you answer them so well. How do you do it? Gee! I know I shall make a mess of this one of mine. I'm old enough to write a better letter, but did not have enough patience to remain in school long enough to get a good education. I am a working girl and guess I can get through with the education I have. Do the rest of you girls like the boys? I do, and I just can't help it. There is one that comes in to see me every night. He kisses me and the worst part of it is I like it, though we are not engaged, but he just will do those things anyway. Is it because he loves me or is he just trying to make me silly about him? He hardly ever dresses up when he comes, just comes in his work clothes. I live not far from where he boards. Gastonia is a great cotton mill town. We have about thirty or forty mills. Love to all the cousins.

MARY.

Mary, if you want to improve your letter writing, go to a night school if there is one in your city. It only needs the will to do and a little self determination and you can make yourself a hundred per cent more proficient and efficient in anything you take up, provided, of course, you keep your mind on your task and cut out all the foolishness for a few months. This country is divided into various belts, the pie belt, which cuts dyspeptic New England from the rest of the world, or did until the beckoning hands of the golden west drew the descendants

When Betsy Balked

by William L. Young

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

I AM old-fashioned in this respect—I love a good horse. I have a flivver for quick or long trips, but when there is no need for hurry, I like to drive a spirited animal that pulls on the reins and makes you feel there's something alive ahead of you. Maybe that was one of the reasons that slick stranger had no difficulty in selling Betsy to me. When I looked at the keen eye, the beautifully poised head, the glossy coat, the good action, and then heard the price—I bit! Perhaps you have already guessed what kind of a horse she was, but never you mind, even if I did have all kinds of trouble, I'm not sorry I bought that mare. And somebody else says she isn't sorry, either. But that's getting ahead of my story!

The very first day I tried that mare out I found she wasn't a slouch. She had a long stride and an easy way of reaching out that just swallowed up the road. When I saw how really good she was, a suspicion entered my mind that maybe the chap had sold me stolen property, since he was willing to sell at such a ridiculously low figure. This was worrying me a little that day as we slackened our speed on the first hill.

"Take your time, old girl," I said.

She had come to the same conclusion, for she stopped.

"Gidap!" I tapped her gently with the lines. But she wouldn't!

"Now you get out of here!" I ordered; and I emphasized it with a touch of the whip. She threw her ears back, switched her tail savagely, and rolled her eyes wickedly till the whites showed.

"Possibly something is wrong with the harness," I muttered to myself. I jumped out and looked things over carefully. Everything seemed all right.

"I'll lead you a little piece, Betsy." I reached up, petted the soft nose, and then pulled forward on the bit. She set her forefeet, tossed her head, and wouldn't budge. Then I knew what I was up against—Betsy had balked!

I dropped my hand in surprise, for here was something different. I scratched my head and tried to think. I had never owned a balky horse before in all my life. Something had to be done and that immediately, for I didn't want anybody to catch me in such a predicament and spread the news over the whole county.

So I tried to think of all the plans I had heard were good for a case like this. The first that came to my mind I immediately rejected—to start a little fire under the stubborn nag. That was too cruel. Also, I knew a man who lost a load of straw trying that way—his horse moved just far enough for it to be off and the wagon over the fire. Besides, wouldn't I have been a pretty picture at that job if somebody would have happened along?

The next one that came to my mind I didn't relish, either. It was to bite the left ear of the stubborn animal until it changed its mind. That method seemed rather primitive, and then, too, who would want to be an "ear-chawer"?

The only other plan I thought of was to unhitch the balky critter and lead it around in a circle. I had heard that this was a sure cure. It was claimed that as soon as you would hitch up again, the unruly animal would go right off. This method was easy enough, so I unhitched Betsy in a hurry, and she and I started to play "ring-around-a-ros-ee" till my head swam and my feet wouldn't track. When I couldn't stand it any more, I hitched her up again, crawled into the buggy, and said, "Gidap!" Betsy didn't seem to understand.

"Gidap, Betsy!" But Betsy didn't budge.

Again I repeated with emphasis, "Now, Betsy, gidap!" But she stood stiff-legged, with the firm resolution to fight it out on that line if it took all summer.

I didn't like the idea of staying there that long. What Betsy needed, I decided, was a good tanning. I took the whip, walked to her head, grabbed the bit, looked in her eye, and said, "I hate to do it, old gal, but now you are going to get it!"

No man ever hits a horse over the head; only a brute does that. I let her have it around the forelegs! Swish! Swish! Swish! the whip sang.....

"Young man, I don't think much of a big brute like you beating a poor dumb horse like that! Aren't you ashamed of yourself?"

My whip and jaw dropped at the same time. I looked up amazed, and I tell you I got an eyeful!

Right behind me, seated in one of those high traps, was the Girl. When I say "the Girl," you know what I mean. Ever since I had first seen her three weeks before, I had been scheming and planning some plausible way of meeting her so her first impressions of me would be a help to my plans. But instead—this! You could tell she wasn't thinking nice things about me; her eyes were burning with scorn, and the color coming and going in her cheeks showed me she was downright mad—so mad that she had entirely forgotten the wilted-looking chap in horn spectacles who sat by her side.

I was surprised all right, but after a few moments of confusion I decided I wasn't such a criminal, after all. Besides, here was my opportunity, and I had to make the best of it. So I looked her boldly in the eye, took off my hat with a flourish you would never associate with a bachelor owner of a hog farm, and said, "Miss, I am very sorry to say I'm not ashamed a bit! That mare deserved all she got and more!"

"No, she didn't!" the Girl asserted with emphasis.

"Yes, she did!" I retorted. "That nag there is balking!"

"That doesn't make any difference! You shouldn't abuse any dumb animal! Be patient with it, and talk in kind tones to it as you would to a child, and you can do more with kindness than you can with a dozen whips."

"You got to show me!" I asserted, stubbornly.

She jumped from the trap, went to Betsy's head, stroked the silky nose, whispered something in her ear, and, wonder of wonders, Betsy started off as though she had wanted to all the time!

"For the love of Mike, Miss," I said, "don't stop her! I'll climb in while you lead her, and maybe she will keep a-going!"

I jumped in, took up the lines, and Betsy didn't stop as the Girl let go. As the buggy caught up with her, I said, "Miss, you are a wonder. I dare not stop to tell you all I think, but I promise you I won't use the whip on Betsy again even if she balks on the railroad track!"

"I hold you to your promise," she replied, with the warmest kind of a smile in her eyes.

As I drove to town I had plenty to think about;—"a big brute like you," and that hurt; then the warm little smile and that helped a bit.

* * * * *

My business didn't keep me long. Within an hour I had turned Betsy's nose homeward. Away we went! People turned to watch us. What speed! What action! Ah, this was worth while, I thought, forgetting all about Betsy's contrariness on the trip in. If I could meet the Girl now,——

"Faster yet, Betsy!" I touched her with the lines, and then it happened again!

In the midst of her stride she started to stop! Her muscles were tensed, she lit stiff-legged, the buggy stopped with a jerk that almost pitched me out on her back.

My first thought was to grab the whip, but I remembered my promise, and that stopped me. Peeping cautiously up the road past Betsy's ears, I saw something that saved her, for there in the distance was the trap returning.

I jumped from the buggy, walked to Betsy's head, turned away from the coming trap, petted the mare's nose, and when I was sure the Girl was sure enough to hear, I began to speak in words that just dripped honey, "Betsy, dear, I would be ever so much obliged if you would just gidap!" "My own little Betsy, won't you please condescend to go on just a tee-ny, wee-ny little bit farther? If it's not too inconvenient for you, Betsy, let's go home!"

Then the Girl laughed.

Looking around as if astonished at her presence, I exclaimed, "Oh, how you surprised me! You see, Betsy has balked again! I am trying to be patient with her and talk to her in kind tones as I would to a che-ild, for I feel I can do more in this way than if I would wear out a dozen whips on her!" And I looked at the Girl and grinned.

"But she doesn't go," she said.

"Maybe she would for you," I suggested.

She jumped out of the trap, hastened across to Betsy, and again the mare listened to her whispered appeal.

"Miss," I said, "if that mare balks once more, I am going to give 'er to you!"

She smiled, jumped into the trap beside the be-spectacled chap she called Dickie, and drove away.

* * * * *

During the week that followed, Betsy was on her good behavior. Not once did she balk. Her coat became glossier, she held her head higher, and for style—there was no better in the country.

I made it my business to find out more about the Girl, and the news wasn't good for me! I knew her father. He had been a farmer before he bought the mill in town, and he had lots of common sense. Her name was Mary. She had just returned from an eastern school, and this weak-kneed Dickie boy had hot-footed it away out here after her. People said this young fellow had more money than was good for him, and that Mary didn't look on him with disfavor. What I couldn't understand was why her dad didn't turn that dude so he faced east and kick him on the sunset side hard enough to give him a flying start over several counties on his way back home. But he didn't, and everywhere that Mary went, that lamb was sure to go.

And then we met again. I was driving Betsy to town. She was feeling frisky and I had trouble to hold her. Faster and faster we went till suddenly we came to a turn in the road hid by a high bank. I was just thinking I had better slow up when an automobile dashed around the curve. The glare of the sun on the lamps and windshield, and its sudden appearance, were more than Betsy could stand. She started to waltz on her hind feet—then, with a snort, tried to turn a handspring over a ditch and a high fence. I yelled and yanked and jerked and tried to stop her, but she wouldn't be stopped. She made a fizzle of the handspring, however, but succeeded finally in knocking off the right forewheel against a telephone post. Then the shafts came off, and I was dragged by the lines over the dashboard, landing easily and gracefully on my chin. I let go of the lines and doubled up my stalwart frame. Betsy, pretty well tangled up by this time, shivered a little, and stopped dead still.

In that auto were the Girl and Dickie. She was driving. When she saw how she had scared my horse, she threw on the brakes so suddenly that the hind wheels skidded. A moment later she was kneeling beside me and looking with troubled eyes down into my face.

"You!" I murmured, pianissimo.

"Are you hurt?" she demanded.

I knew I wasn't, except for a scratch or two, but I didn't want to disappoint anybody. "Sure!" I replied, and I looked up in just the right way. I knew how, for sometimes I go to the "movies," too.

"Are you badly hurt?" she asked; I could see she was terribly worried.

"You bet I am!" I said enthusiastically. "You just feel how hot my head is!"

She did. I placed my hand on top of hers to help, closed my eyes, and wondered how long it would last. Finally she must have realized the pressure on her hand wasn't a sick man's, for she pulled it away.

"Don't you think you could walk to the machine?" she asked. "Then I could take you to a doctor!"

"I don't know!" I replied. "I'm willing to try." I reached for her hand to help me up; so supported on one side by her and on the other by the Dickie boy, I limped over and crawled into the car.

"Dickie, I will take this gentleman to the doctor. Will you ride his horse to our stable, and see she is taken care of? Now, that's a good boy!"

"But that's a vicious creature!" Dickie demurred. "It's hard to tell what it might do!"

"Look, how quiet she stands! If you're afraid, I'll take the horse and you take the car!" she replied, rather indignantly.

"Oh, I can do it all right, but I hate to spoil our whole afternoon just on account of that fellow!" he said, as he reluctantly and timidly approached Betsy.

The girl jumped into the car beside me and away we went. "I'm sorry for it all, Mr. Morning," she said. "I'll have father pay——"

"How do you know my name's Morning?" I looked at her in astonishment.

"You keep still. You're supposed to be hurt," she replied with a smile. Then she dropped her eyes—"If it will help your health any, I've heard Father mention your name several times——"

"Say," I demanded boldly and bluntly, "is that Dickie boy back there anything to you?"

"That's none of your business, sir!" she answered, saucily, but her eyes weren't as impudent as her words.

Then, though I didn't know what to say, a great hope warmed my heart.

We were silent a moment but after a time she turned to look back. I did the same, and what we saw probably more than what we thought caused us to say in unison, "Poor Dickie!" For back in the distance there was an equestrian statue in the middle of the road. Betsy had balked!

The Talcott Treasure

By Anne McQueen

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

CHAPTER VI.

"NANCY—is it a coffin!" stammered Eleanor's stiff lips, as her shovel clattered weakly upon the soft earth; clattered with a thud that sounded loud as a clarion to her startled ears—the sound was so—suggestive!

But Nancy, saneness returning to her practical, everyday mind with a comforting calm, after the brief period of hysterical fear she had felt when her spade struck something that was not earth, had again seized her graveyard implement with capable fingers and was wildly but surely digging away the clay from some lumpy, bulky objects that were dimly assuming shape in the moonlight. She paid no heed to Eleanor's horrified question—or exclamation, rather; Nancy was too busy, just then, to even think of Eleanor!

Now she sat flat upon the ground and began scratching away the lumps of soft soil from the objects with her hands. "Eleanor, turn on the flashlight," commanded Nancy, in such clear, unafraid tones that Eleanor, though her fingers still trembled convulsively, managed to press the big bead of light full upon the thing—a knobby, bulging object which Nancy held aloft.

"What is it? Oh, what is it, Nancy?" breathed Eleanor, her voice tense with excitement.

"It's a bag," said Nancy, solemnly. "Eleanor, child, I believe to my soul we've found the treasure!"

"Thank heaven," sobbed Eleanor, shakily, "thank heaven it isn't——bones!"

"Goose!" scoffed Nancy, sternly, "don't you dare taint or—or anything, Eleanor! Of course it isn't bones—who expected to find 'em? I knew it the gold was buried here, it wouldn't begin to——reach down to bones! Sit down here and help me dig 'em up! My lands, there's a heap of them—quick, Eleanor!"

Obediently Eleanor began to help uncover the bags—leather bags, clinking thrillingly as she shook them. At last, piled beside the open grave—or mound, as Nancy insisted upon terming it—were—ten bags of leather! Was the Talcott gold found at last?

"The flashlight, Eleanor," commanded Nancy, "turn it this way. I'm going to open one of these bags and see what's in it! Feels right, but I may be mistaken."

Surely her fingers fumbled with the knot of the buckskin thong tied securely about the mouth of the pouch; Nancy felt strangely steady and calm, now that the task was ended the weird shadows were now but friendly trees, the mysterious moon but a kind candle, lighting their way, and the slabs of the grassy mound seemed positively benevolent looking—all horror had vanished with the success of the undertaking.

Slowly the knot yielded, the thong untwisted, and Nancy poured into her lap a slow stream of coins—eagles and double-eagles, hard gold of the United States mint—the Talcott treasure was found at last!

A prayer of thanksgiving trembled on Eleanor's lips as she viewed the gold; and Nancy, joyous Nancy, felt strangely solemn at the sight—the dream come true at last!

In another moment she had struggled to her feet, and was piling the bags in a wheelbarrow that Bahama used to haul away the dead leaves that dropped constantly from the trees and shrubs. Then, aided now by Eleanor, whose hands trembled nearly as much from joy as they had from fear, she began to mound up the opened treasure-hole, even as it had been; sweeping up the soft bits of clay, and at last covered it with a sprinkling of leaves from the pile in the corner of the enclosure. They also spread leaves in a thin shower over the trodden ground where they had stood—when the task was ended to Nancy's complete satisfaction—turning on the flashlight to observe discrepancies, and correct them, they trundled the barrow back to the house, laden with its precious argosy—a veritable golden fleece in eagles and double-eagles—the fortune that was to make the Talcott place again blossom like the rose with beauty!

Arrived in their room with the golden hoard—one bag, the one Nancy had untied, left out, and the others stored snugly in the depths of Nancy's trunk, that young lady immediately felt the need of a stimulant, and, lighting her spirit-lamp, proceeded to brew two cups of strong tea for the steadying of their shaken nerves.

As they drank their tea, the two girls talked happily about the beautiful things to be done with the money.

"You can make the old place a paradise, Eleanor—a veritable garden of Eden," said Nancy, as she drank her last sip, and began to pour out the coins to count them and see if the bag really contained five thousand dollars. "Dear me, how I long to see it!"

"This bag is for you, Nancy, a wedding present for you," said Eleanor, softly, as she ran the golden coins through her slender fingers, "you deserve at least half, but I know you wouldn't take it."

"No, ma'am—there are a few things I'm pretty pig headed about," agreed Nancy. "And I won't take a single, solitary bag of your gold-money, honey-child! But I do want a wedding-present the worst way, and I'll tell you what it is: A whole set—a replica, in fact, of china like yours—with my monogram in the middle of each piece! I'm fairly crazy about the gold-banded dinner-set; if I have one as like it as two peas in one pod, my soul's desire will be satisfied! I want it," Nancy's eyes twinkled, but a rose-flush deepened charmingly upon her dimpled cheeks, "I want it for my——descendants. Think how lovely it will be for them to say: 'This china belonged to great-great-Grandma Carr—she that was Nancy Dare—a wedding present from her best friend.' I declare it is a beautiful thing to have ancestors, isn't it? That's what I, being a plebian of the plebes, most long for, Eleanor-darling," said Nancy, with a nod of finality, "and that is what I'll have—or nothing at all!"

"It shall be done, great-great Grandma Nancy," laughed Eleanor, her own velvet-brown eyes dancing, her own lily-white cheeks now a delicate rose with pleasurable excitement. "Now let us count this bag very carefully, and then you shall tell me what to do with all of them."

When it was counted, very carefully, and found to be correct to the last eagle and double-eagle of the whole five thousand, they poured back the glittering rain—rather dull rain, in truth—and placed the bags with the rest in Nancy's trunk.

Then, lying comfortably in bed, but very, very wide awake, they planned—or rather Nancy planned—the disposal of the wealth.

"Tomorrow John Carr will be in Savannah, he wrote," said Nancy. "I'll go to Mr. Jake Louder's store—heaven be thanked for it!—and telephone a long-distance message. He'll be here right away, and he can tell us what to do better than anybody else. My advice is to let him deposit it in some bank in a city, where it won't be talked of all over creation—I think, for the the present, I'd keep the news—old Mrs. Warner is the only person interested, and she has gone back out west, to see about her grandbaby's teeth. Mr. Jake Louder told me the other day that folks in town said all the family were to go, because the old lady won't stay home and take care of them. Then, in a city, John would find some sure way of making investments, so that you will have an income without touching your principal—only enough to put things in shape out here."

"I'll be glad to leave it all to him," agreed Eleanor, fervently. She sighed, and her head nestled drowsily in its pillow. "Now, honey, let's go to sleep—and forget! I'm so heavenly happy that I feel like singing a song of thanksgiving every minute—but, oh, Nancy, I don't think I'd go through those awful moments again, even to find a fortune!"

"It was pretty tough—pretty tough, I'll admit," conceded Nancy, "but well worth while. Still, unless I was certain-sure, I'd hate to tackle another such job, right away!"

Nancy was out of bed early next morning; Eleanor was still sleeping, the deep, dreamless sleep of utter weariness. Cautiously Nancy slipped on her clothes, and tiptoed out of the room, and out of the house, on her way to Mr. Jake Louder's store, to send John Carr a long-distance 'phone message; and, incidentally, to meet David Muir at the hour and place they had previously agreed upon, in the event of the grave-robbery coming off, to report results to that young man, whom Nancy found restlessly pacing under a tree by the roadside, smoking his pipe, and with his hands in the baggy pockets of his breeches.

"Joy, joy, forever! My task is done—
The gates are open—and heaven is won!"

sang Nancy, in the words of Peri on regaining Paradise. "David Muir, man, your hunch was a hunch sent right straight from the little god o' good-luck!"

"So?" observed David Muir, quietly taking his pipe out of his mouth and smiling upon the radiant girl very tenderly. "How about the gates being open for me, pal?"

"I think they'll open very, very wide, so that you can come riding through with all ease. The whole ten bags were there, my son—intact, for we counted one of 'em."

"I'm glad it came to me—that hunch," said David Muir, with a sigh of relief. "I began to think about it that day you told me of the unknown grave—seemed likely that they'd hide the treasure in such a place, you know. Well, how is my princess? Did she stand it all right? Must have been pretty gruesome business—I wanted awfully to help, but it wouldn't have done, of course."

"No, indeed—and she's well—she's radiantly happy, planning all sorts of improvements. Man, in a few months you won't know the old plantation—and Eleanor will be the dandiest neighbor one could wish, for she can return favors, and visits, and feel your equal even though she has only fifty thousand—a mere bagatelle to you big rich folks."

"Plenty of money, I think," declared David Muir, emphatically. "And now, Nancy Dare, tell me like a good fellow. When can I come, do you think?"

"I'm going back with—a certain drummer man who's coming," said Nancy. "Eleanor doesn't know it yet, but I am, for I gave him my promise to marry him without a frock to my back as soon as our treasure-quest was ended. Then—remember, Eleanor knows nothing about these clandestine meetings of ours—you be Johnny-on-the-spot, and come to tender first aid to the lonely. Now that she has money, she won't be at all offended for you to offer to return the money for that truck Methusela-mule ate up. Once inside the gates, I trust you can find your way about!" And Nancy looked upon the young man with laughing eyes of understanding.

"Sure!" echoed David Muir, with a like glint in his own blue orbs. "Once inside, trust me to find the way—to my princess's heart, I hope," he added, softly, and Nancy, with a sympathetic squeeze of his hand, whispered amen!

John Carr came at once. Nancy met him down at the gate, and the two had a very confidential talk, which resulted in John's promising, with joyous acquiesence, to carry out her plans in all things, in consideration of Nancy herself fulfilling the promise made to him—viz: to marry him at once and leave the next day for New York, to which city he was on his way at last, for a permanent stay.

Eleanor, though rather dazed at Nancy's decision graciously acceded. "You've been too heavenly good to me, Nancy-love, for me to stand in the way of your happiness a minute," she declared. "The only thing I regret is that I can't give you the wedding—for you won't wait!"

"But don't forget the wedding-gift," warned Nancy. "I can take, carefully wrapped, one of each of the pieces, and have 'em duplicated—I don't want foreign ware, home-products are good enough for me. And I'll take the safest care of them. But I warn you, young lady, it's going to cost you a pretty penny indeed!"

And so, with the gold safe in their possession, and a good, crisp check-book on a perfectly sound bank in New York in Eleanor's, they all went, next day, to the town, where Eleanor saw her friend married by a bewildered minister, who was told that he must hurry the ceremony because they had to catch a train!

David Muir struck while the iron was hot; the very day after Nancy's departure, Daphne, with perturbed face—account of having a certain silver dollar in her pocket—came in to inform Eleanor that Mr. Muir was waiting on the porch, to see her on, what Daphne declared was "powerful 'ticklar business."

And Eleanor, with a strange fluttering, like a little bird in her breast, went straight out to greet the "half-stranger" with simple cordiality, and a light in her eyes that made his own heart sing for joy at the sight.

"The mule? You want to return the money for the damage, which wasn't worth mentioning?" pondered Eleanor, who had, for the moment, forgotten all about the unfortunate Neddy. "Oh——I remember, now! But, really, Mr. Muir, you must keep the money—I am sure the manager's estimate was just. But I thank you," she added, with a smile that set his heart a-flutter, "because it was a neighborly thing for you to do, of course,—thinking about me, and that little bit of money, when you were so far away."

"My mother is coming down next week," declared David Muir, knowing that his parent lived but to please her son. "You'll call on her, won't you, Miss Talcott? She'll be so very lonely, for there won't be anybody but me. We—we want to plan some alterations for the winter."

"I'll love to!" said Eleanor, warmly, and David Muir, thanking the god of good-luck, went straight back to his estate of Green Lands, called his mother up in her summer home in the far north, and commanded her to come at once down south—if she loved her boy!

Eleanor, conveyed by Mr. Jake Louder in his buggy, went to town next day; the purposes of her visit being very numerous. First of all, Eleanor went to the really good department-store and bought her some fetching little frocks—things she had not had time or money to think about since she left the city. Then she bought one or two simple but vastly becoming rose-wreathed and floppy hats, and some dainty shoes, and other toilet accessories which she had considered superfluous for so long.

After that, under the guidance of Mr. Louder, who possessed a critical eye for horseflesh, she bought a darling, butterball of a pony, and a carriage to match, thrilling at the thought of the pleasant drives she would now be able to take, and mourning because Nancy could not share them.

Then she saw sundry workmen—paper-hangers, plasterers carpenters, engaging them to come out immediately and begin work on the old house, hoping, in her heart, that they would finish before Mrs. Muir should come down from the north.

With money all things—nearly—are possible. In the sunshine of prosperity the old mansion began to glow with some of its former cheeriness; the grove was cleared, the avenue graded, fences—good wire—enclosed the grounds, with handsome iron gates; hammer and saw sounded noisily throughout the old walls, Daphne had a housemaid to assist her, and Bahama found himself superintending the labor of half-a-dozen brawny black men with much joy—it was truly, the old darkeys told themselves, like old times; they wondered a bit how Eleanor came into her money, but had vague ideas that somebody had left it to her, as was perfectly natural. Bahama, being closely questioned by Mr. Jake Louder, went so far as to state that "somebody—some o' Miss Eleanor's kinnery up Norf done lef' her 'bout a milyun dollars—or maybe more!"

As the North was a country very vague and far away, where people were wont to count their money up into such sums, Mr. Louder gave the tale ready credence, and repeated it, with additions, to all his customers, so that Eleanor soon acquired the reputation of being a millionaire, like the "big-rich" Muirs from the North.

Eleanor saw no more of David Muir till his mother came, when he promptly appeared to inform her of the fact, and to beg that she would call as early as possible, to cheer that lady's loneliness.

A wise man was David Muir, and bided his time—he would not storm his lady's heart, as an embattled fortress, but coax it winningly, as a shy, white dove, which one must gentle before it comes to nestle willingly within the tamer's bosom. Eleanor, he knew, must be wooed and won—if possible—in such manner.

For David Muir was no cock-sure young man, confident in his own success in affairs of the heart. He loved Eleanor—he had meant to win her; but each day, seeing more and more of what he was wont to term, in his heart, her matchless perfections, and becoming more and more impressed with his own utter unworthiness, his hopes sank, till his mother, wise woman, one day asked him abraptly:

"Well, dear boy, how long am I to wait down in this awful summer weather? Surely you don't intend to deprive me of the entire season!"

Then, being a woman who knew her kind, she went to her boy, and, mothering him softly, murmured: "Of course she will—she does, foolish child! No woman on earth is good enough for you, but she comes nearer than most of them! And a woman loves a man who knows he is worthy of her!"

Fate led them to meet, that very morning, upon the road at the letter-box by the tree with the grapevine hanging down with its burden of tiny green grapes.

"Do you remember," asked David Muir, softly, "that day a stranger-man gathered grapes from that vine for you?"

And, seeing a swift flame leap in rosy rushes over face and throat, and quick drooping of heavy lashes to hide the velvet shyness of the soft eyes, David Muir knew, instinctively, that his mother's words were true, and his humility and diffidence fell from him like a discarded garment, so that he boldly folded his lady to his breast, in the shadow of the great tree, where no passer by could see, and whispered his love in words that burned straight into her heart—once more he was a man, and masterful, sure of his mate, at last!

"Since that day, sweetheart," he whispered into the little crumpled pink shell of an ear, kissing away the soft tendrils of hair to find room for his lips to tell his secret more softly, "since that day I have loved you, and wanted you, and longed for this time to come that I might tell you I love you—love you—love you!"

He needed no whispered word to assure him that his love was returned—he knew it, as men do, by the face close-hidden on his breast, and the little hands that fluttered and lay still, like homing birds, in the clasp of his own; and the rose-flood that warmed the sweet, white neck, and the thousaml signs that a lover's eye knows well to mean the answer he craves.

It was later, when they wandered in the depths of the protecting woods that would now belong to both, that David Muir, serenely masculine, now that the white dove had come to nestle in his breast, looked into his sweetheart's shy eyes and commanded her to tell him truly when she first began to love him.

And Eleanor, rose-flushed with shame, star-eyed with love, obeyed the mandate of her mate, and answered truly:

"Since that day I first saw you—the day you gathered the grapes!"

"If we had only lived in the stone-hatchet age," groaned David Muir, "I would have seized you by the hair of your head that day and borne you away to my cave, to live happy ever after! As it is, we've wasted so much precious time that I'll swear I won't stand it much longer! If you don't want to be toted bodily away to my abode, darling of my heart, you must hurry up our wedding day!"

"As soon as the house is finished, and—and a wedding-frock made for me," smiled Eleanor, "and Nancy comes, and——"

"No more!" commanded David Muir, imprisoning his lady in the fortress of his arms, "now, mate of mine, here you stay till this question is settled!"

But there was much to do, though Eleanor obediently hurried, aided by Mrs. Muir, by David, who sent a new staff of workmen, and by Nancy Carr, who came at her friend's summons, leaving her John desolate in their charming New York apartments.

But it must be confessed that the brunt of things fell upon Mrs. Muir and Nancy, for Eleanor and her David shamelessly deserted them, spending idyllic hours in the greenwoods, and in his car, on the wide, free roads, and shirking responsibility in a manner entirely foreign to Eleanor, who but followed the fashion of her ancestral women in yielding obedience to her chosen lord, and doing his lordly will.

"I wouldn't have believed it," wrote Nancy to her John, "but since I've seen it with my own eyes, I know it's nature—she's just reverted to type.

"'Eleanor,' I'll say, "'tell us how you want this done?'

"'Oh, Nancy-honey, just do it as you please,' answers my lady, and hies her away to where David's whistle—yes, John, his whistle—sounds at the door, to stroll in the woods, or race on the road, or ride horseback, or do anything her liege-lord commands. She even let me—and her future mother-in-law, who is really a dear, not high-and-mighty a bit—choose her trousseau, merely stipulating that it won't cost over a certain very modest sum, for a lady who has come into a fortune of her own, and will shortly possess countless—more or less—millions.

"But she insists that it shall be an old-fashioned home wedding, with a supper, and a dance afterwards, and the gold-banded china, and the fine cut-glass, and all the silver of her ancestors displayed, and the house beautiful with flowers, and two or three nigger fiddlers to make the music—and Mr. Jake Louder and his family, and Bahama and Daphne, and all the servants, present. Says her mother told her, when she was little, that her own mother had that sort of a wedding—all the poor-whites, and all the niggers were there; the first as the most courteously treated of all the guests, because that class are known to possess acute 'feelings', and the latter as spectators of their white-folks' happiness, and partakers of the feast, which must be bountiful, and old-timey.

"You will be surprised beyond utterance when you come to the wedding and see the old place, and the wonders that money has wrought. Fresh-painted, fresh-plastered, fresh-papered, new roofed, new polished and brightened and cleaned, with the light of heaven pouring fearlessly in upon the shining, satin-rubbed furniture that it has always contained, restored and rejuvenated, and come into its own again.

"My heart has sung paeans of joy over the new curtains, and new carpets, and new hangings and furnishings that had to be bought fresh from the shops, for my heart, as you know, John-boy, doesn't live in the past. But I must say the old satiny rosewood and mahogany and ebony furniture suits the house, perfectly, and the old china and silver is glorious to behold. Nancy's mother-in-law will be proud to have her kin from the North come down and see the abode of her Southern daughter-in-law.

"And she and David will always make this their winter home, for he says that Green Lands, his mammoth estate, belongs to his mother, during her lifetime, and as the Talcott place belongs to his wife, he will of necessity have to live upon his womenfolk, anyway, so he prefers that his wife shall do her marital duty by giving her husband a home!

"Of course he has decided on this for Eleanor's sake—he knows that it will always be the dearest spot on earth to her—and he owns castles, and ranches, and what not in the North and West.

"But the crowning joy of this transformation is seen best in the complete making-over, so to speak, of old Bahama and Daphne, whose cottage in the back-yard is elegant in new paint and new furniture. The old darkeys themselves are splendid. Bahama has a suit of livery—to be worn first on the night of the wedding—of blue broadcloth and gold buttons that make him look like some foreign potentate; and Daphne, good, faithful soul, has a black silk dress and a lace cap, and broad, gold hoop earrings, and a fine linen, lace-edged apron, and accessories, that will make her look, upon the eventful evening on which she will wear her new clothes, like a regular African queen, at least.

"But, oh, John-dear, I tremble to think what would have become of poor Eleanor if it hadn't been for that blessed money! David Muir says he would have found a way, but I don't know—she so—powerful-proud that I'm afraid she would never have consented to go to her King Cophetua as a beggar-maid. However, it's settled, thanks be, by that heaven-sent treasure!

"I'm so busy I don't hardly have time to breathe, or eat, or do any other normal and accustomed thing, except think about my jo-John, and wish for him every blessed minute, and pray for the time to come when he'll come hurrying down to his own WIFE, NANCY."

At last the long-looked-for day arrived, and the old house brave in flowers and glorious with lights, and gleaming with silver, and shining with fair old furniture, opened wide its doors to receive within its portals the wedding-guests of its fair young mistress, who, purely-clad as a white lily, stood by her bridegroom's side in the flower-decked halls, and listened to the words of the old minister who was an ancient friend of the former mistress of the old mansion, and who had performed for her the last rites due the dead.

Then it was all funereal dreariness, now it was all light, and music and flowers, and smiling faces—emblems all of a fair future for the twain made one.

And, after the ceremony, and congratulations from the new relatives, and the poor-whites, and the darkeys, and Mistress Nancy, matron-of-honor only less fair than the bride, and John Carr, rosier and chubbier than ever, under Nancy's kindly ministrations, there was the banquet—the old-fashioned wedding-supper, served by Daphne, who superintended the cooking of every old-time dish, and who guaranteed the feast to be a faithful replica of those given by her white-folks in the good old days before the war.

For days the feast had been preparing, the wide-throated kitchen-chimney had smoked valorously with the fires of pots, and spiders and skillets and ovens set upon the broad hearth, cooking such things as no modern range could dare to attempt.

Out in the yard there had been fires going up, also—meats barbecued, after the good old way—lambs and pigs and chickens; with pots of mammoth size full of delectable game stew—the celebrated Brunswick stew, whose composition is supposed to be unknown to benighted Yankees.

There was a bride-cake, which Eleanor cut, with much laughter from the guests, who found their fortunes in the thimble, the coin, the ring, it contained. Such a cake as nobody but an old Southern darkey, instructed by an old-time mistress and inherited instinct, could have concocted; there were turkeys, and game, and vegetables and desserts, all unknown to most of the guests, and thoroughly enjoyed for the novelty as well as for their perfection.

"One would think we were living in the middle of the past century," marveled one of the northern guests—"this is a banquet like those you read about in old books—it is perfect!"

"Eleanor insists upon preserving the traditions of her family," declared the elder Mrs. Muir, complacently—she was very proud of her beautiful daughter-in-law, and, being herself a member of a family whose money was "made in trade," felt a proper respect for the ancient aristocracy. "She isn't rich, of course, but I always say blood is to be preferred to money, and she is fortunate in being descended from a very old and honorable family, which, unfortunately, is extinct, except for herself. David and I are enormously proud of her."

After the supper there was an old-fashioned dance in the broad hall, with the negro musi-

Your Good and Bad Points

I THINK one of the most foolish things any of us can do is to wear our hair done low because Polly looks so pretty with her hair that way, or done high because Margaret is so stunning with her high coiffure; or our dresses wide at the hip because Ernestine is so fetching with her bunched draperies, or scant and slinky because tall, graceful Dorothea is so delightful to look at in sheathlike gowns.

There is only one safe method to follow in deciding upon gowns, coiffures, even deportment—to study one's self and adopt the style which harmonizes with our height, weight, mannerisms, idiosyncracies. Some cunning young girl perches herself on a porch railing and thrums the ukelele. Immediately Sadie, who weighs 160 pounds, is short and somewhat clumsy of movement, purchases a ukelele and painstakingly imitates the abandon of Polly, aged seventeen, weighing about 105, and naturally vivacious.

A DUTCH NECK AND AN UPTURNED BRIM.

It can't be done!

In choosing gowns and hats, be not led astray by their becomingness for someone else. It is you who have to wear them. Take the necks of gowns, for instance. Jane can't wear a square-necked gown—it is quite unbecoming and makes her figure look broad. When Jane wears a neck which slopes to a graceful V, her figure looks graceful and not at all broad. Nothing is prettier than the Dutchneck, with its lovely youthful square, but unless it is becoming to your figure do not wear it. A very thin chest or a very broad chest cannot take a square neck satisfactorily. The V is the better mode for them.

Then consider hats. Just because one of your friends wears a hat which turns up straight from her forehead, do not attempt the same fashion until you have experimented and found that it is the most becoming style for you. Perhaps you will look a thousand times better in a hat which, while it does not shadow your face, yet has a bandeau or inner brim which fits down about your head and forms an attractive setting. Such a bandeau may be of flowers, or feathers, or merely of crushed ribbon or cloth of gold. Whichever kind of a hat you wear, always let a little of your hair show below the line of hat which fits to your head. A hat which fits down on a bare forehead is not becoming to anyone.

As to skirts, don't wear extremely short skirts, though they happen to be fashionable, unless you look well in them. A very tall thin girl looks ridiculous in short skirts; so does a fat girl.

In other words, my dear, use your own good judgment, and look at yourselves as if you were someone else altogether, considering carefully what sort of clothes look best on that particular person. Only in that way will you make the most of your good points and conceal your bad ones.

Answers to Questions

NEVADA.—I am afraid you can't get rid of the hairs under your arm for good," as you put it. But you can remove them with a depilatory if you do not like shaving them. They will come back, and you will have to use a depilatory over and over again, but that is not such a very great amount of trouble. There are many satisfactory depilatories on the market which are safe for under-arm use. Look through our dvertising columns.

ROSE H.—I am afraid I cannot be a great deal of help about the scrofula scars and surgical scars. The best I can do for you is to suggest that you massage them daily, quite gently but persistently, with a good massage cream. And that when you are dressing to go out, you rub in a little cold cream, wipe off the surface with a soft cloth, and then dust on some powder and gently wipe the surface. Keep your skin in the best condition possible and the scars will be least noticeable. I am sorry I cannot recommend any proprietary remedy in these columns but it is against the rules of every magazine. There are many good face creams advertised, and depilatories as well. Do not use the latter on your face, however.

MAY B.—I think quite likely you have been using soap and hot water on your face too frequently. Soap eats away the outer skin, and hot water carries away the oil which should lubricate the skin and keep it soft. Do not use soapy water more than once a day, and that at night, and be sure to rinse thoroughly afterward. Do not use hot water, but warm water, for this special face bath, and the rest of the day use only tepid water without soap. If your face becomes actually soiled during the day, wipe it off with a little cold cream. The dirt will be removed and the skin not harmed. Soap used too often roughens the skin and inclines it to wrinkle. Hot water enlarges the pores and makes them lazy so that they stay open instead of keeping closed. To prevent this, always dash cold water on the face after bathing it, to close the pores. Never do this unless the face is spotlessly clean, however, or the pores will close up with dust inside—result, blackheads!

VIOLET.—No, raw eggs will not help to add weight, but they are an extremely good food, giving you strength and making you strong. The foods which add fat are potatoes, rice, bread and butter, milk, cream, cereals, gravies, and a certain amount of sweets. Too much sweet food has the opposite effect, as the stomach will not digest it. Chew your food properly, eat at meals only, and you will get the most good from what you eat. To take the milk diet, you should for the first week eat no solid food except for one meal, at night. On rising in the morning, eat half-a-dozen prunes which have been thoroughly washed, then soaked in warm water over night. Chew these thoroughly and drink the juice. Fifteen minutes later take a glass of milk, chewing each mouthful before swallowing. Thereafter, take a glass of milk every hour until about four o'clock. Eat your one meal at six or six-thirty. Between that hour and going to bed drink two glasses of hot water. Continue this for one week. At the end of the week, drop all solid food and drink two glasses of milk every hour, beginning, say, at 7.30 in the morning and continuing to and including 6.30 at night. If you begin later, continue just so much later; if you begin earlier, stop just so much earlier. Take your prunes in the morning, as before, and your hot water about an hour before retiring, or at any time between your last glass of milk and the hour before bedtime. Continue this treatment for at least six weeks. You will gain from one to three or four pounds a week. Weigh on the afternoon of the last day of each week.

A V NECK AND A FLOWER BANDEAU.

L. G.—Your general health is to blame for your hair. Look to that. In the meantime, shampoo once in two or three weeks, brush the hair gently each night, and braid before retiring, letting it down in the daytime when you can spare fifteen minutes, and sit in the sun, shaking and lifting the hair to air it and to let the sun shine on it. Before going to bed, massage the scalp. Dip the fingers in olive oil very lightly, then slip them against the scalp, one on each side of the head. Holding the fingers firmly in place, with the flat of the tips against the scalp, move the skin back and forth on the skull. Do this a few times, then move the fingers to another spot, and so continue until you have gone over the entire scalp, loosening the scalp. Hair is never healthy when the scalp is tight, and such massage stimulates the action of the blood cells, and sends a healthy flow to the scalp. It might be a good idea if the night before a shampoo you used a medicine dropper filled with oil, and, parting the hair, ran the dropper down the part, parting again in a new place and repeating the treatment, and so continuing until the whole scalp has been thoroughly anointed. Tie the hair up in a towel, and let stay until your shampoo the next day. This loosens any dandruff. The flu has no doubt depleted your bodily force and your hair is paying the price. You must feed yourself up, rest yourself, pay special attention to brisk body rubs daily, and do all the other things which will put your entire body in good shape. Until that is at normal, your hair will not be healthy.

MRS. W. A. P.—I am sorry it is against the rules of the department to answer letters except through the columns of the paper. The ammonia you are using is all right. The other of which you speak is the same thing, somewhat diluted, colored and perfumed. It would not be as efficacious. Keep right on. If you use the ammonia one day and the peroxide the next day, and do not skip one treatment, you need not be afraid that the hair will grow. The ammonia dries it up in time.

A FRIEND.—To enlarge your bust by exercise, practice the following:

To Develop Bust

Standing with heels together, toes out, chin up, back straight, chest out, raise your arms on a level with your shoulders straight in front of you, palm to palm. Now throw your arms back vigorously as if trying to make them meet behind your back, being careful that the arms are not below the level of the shoulders. Bring them forward again, then throw them back. Of course they will not meet, but each time you will do a little better, and you are vigorously exercising the chest muscles. Exercise means perspiration and perspiration means decrease of flesh. Breathe in as you throw your arms back, exhale slowly as you bring them back to first position. Wrapping the bust in hot, wet Turkish towels, replacing with fresh hot ones as fast as they cool, will induce perspiration and help in reduction. Epsom salts in the water is a further aid. This should be kept up for fifteen minutes at a time. Your exercises should be taken at least twice a day, but never with your corsets on or other close-fitting clothing. You must be perfectly free of movement when exercising. Swinging dumb-bells or Indian clubs will help, using a punching bag and playing tennis.

TWO SISTERS.—White spots on the nails are usually caused by striking the nails against something. If you are careful of your nails, they will grow out and the white spots will disappear in the growing, then you need not let new white spots come. The flu does deadly deeds to hair. See what I said to "L. G." Tetter is a skin trouble. Anthing which keeps the blood pure and healthy will help any skin disease. As to dandruff, see answer to "L. G." and use the oil treatment the night before shampooing. For the dark complexion, it may be a perfectly good healthy complexion; but if it comes from some bodily trouble, you can overcome it by eating proper things, bathing daily, and being especially careful that your bowels move very freely at least once a day. The latest hair dressing? Well, that depends on age and becomingness of style. Bobbed hair is perfectly fashionable for the age of either of you. Hair parted from ear to ear, or from just back of the ear to just back of the opposite ear, can have the back portion braided, while the front portion is parted a little to one side, then each portion of the front gently rolled back from the face becomingly, and the ends braided in with the back hair. Other girls roll the ends of the back hair under and pin it in a roll, giving it a bobbed effect; while the front hair is parted, and each side rolled a little bit low over each ear.

Your Hair Needs Danderine

Save your hair and double its beauty. You can have lots of long, thick, strong, lustrous hair. Don't let it stay lifeless, thin, scraggly or fading. Bring back its color, vigor and vitality. Get a 35-cent bottle of delightful "Danderine" at any drug or toilet counter to freshen your scalp; check dandruff and falling hair. Your hair needs stimulating, beautifying "Danderine" to restore its life, color, brightness, abundance. Hurry, Girls!

Don't Spoil Your Hair By Washing It

When you wash your hair, be careful what you use. Most soaps and prepared shampoos contain too much alkali, which is very injurious, as it dries the scalp and makes the hair brittle.

The best thing to use is Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo, for this is pure and entirely greaseless. It's very cheap and beats anything else all to pieces. You can get this at any drug store, and a few ounces will last the whole family for months.

Simply moisten the hair with water and rub it in, about a teaspoonful is all that is required. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, cleanses thoroughly, and rinses out easily. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and is soft, fresh looking, bright, fluffy, wavy and easy to handle. Besides, it loosens and takes out every particle of dust, dirt and dandruff.

USE MURINE FOR YOUR EYES Night and Morning. Have Clean, Healthy Eyes. If they Tire, Itch, Smart or Burn, if Sore, Irritated, Inflamed or Granulated, use Murine often. Soothes, Refreshes. Safe for Infant or Adult. At all Druggists. Write for Free Eye Book. Murine Eye Remedy Co., Chicago

HAIR-DYEING COMB

Produces any shade by simply combing, without staining the scalp; perfectly harmless, durable, undetectable. Saves time and money, and is the only practical way of coloring the hair. Write for particulars.

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Full directions for making and use come in each box of Barbo Compound. It will gradually darken streaked, faded gray hair, and make it soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy, and does not rub off.—Advt.

NO MORE GRAY HAIR

You can now have back the hair of your youth with its original color restored. Kolor-Bak now makes this possible. Not a muddy, mussy, greasy dye or stain, but a scientific hair preparation that stimulates into renewed activity the fading pigments which give the hair its natural color. Clean, colorless and stainless. Absolutely harmless. Try it at our risk. If it fails you get your money back. Users say they never dreamed anything could restore gray hair to original color so quickly and with such wonderfully satisfactory results as does Kolor-Bak. Two applications guaranteed to remove dandruff. Stops falling hair. Keeps scalp clean, cool and comfortable—no itching, scales or soreness. No longer any excuse for gray, unlovely hair when Kolor-Bak is so easy to get and costs so little, with absolutely guaranteed satisfactory results. Write today for free book giving positive proof and full explanation. Hygienic Laboratories, 68 W. Washington St., Dept. 153, Chicago, Ill.

Little Things You Shouldn't Do

By Dr. J. W. Campbell

Begin the New Year right by following these instructions for the benefit of your health.

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

DON'T clean your spectacles with paper money. Next to the hands, there are more germs of all sorts on paper money than anywhere else outside a culture tube.

If your eyes happened to be inflamed, or there happened to be a scratch about your eyelids, you might contract an extremely bad case of sore eyes. There are millions of germs on paper money, all sorts of germs from all sorts of people. It is not at all improbable that some of these germs would adhere to the glass and from there get into the eyes or an abrasion near them. Then the sore eyes would result and you would wonder how on earth you happened to be afflicted.

There are many other dangerous little things people are in the habit of doing. Use precaution and omit worry, and you will lessen the dangers of contagion one half. No one should be frightened over these little things. But after knowing about them, there is no excuse for overlooking them or becoming careless.

One of the most common but worst habits is that of rubbing the hands over the face. Upon the human hand are more germs than anywhere else. The hand is constantly coming in contact with door knobs, stair rails, and almost everything else. Yet a great many people will sit, especially when in thought, and meditatively rub their hands over their face, or purse up their lower lip with their fingers, or rub their chin, or absent-mindedly stroke their nose.

There may be a little abrasion on the face. With a man it may be a slight scratch from shaving. With a woman it may be a tiny scratch or a blemish. But if some poisonous germ is transferred from the hand to such an abrasion, a variety of serious things may happen from severe blood poisoning to other and worse germ diseases. The germs have been transferred to the hand first in a street car or store or public place.

Probably when most of the present grown-up generation was at the school days long ago, they were told not to put a lead pencil in the mouth because it hardened the graphite and spoiled the pencil. Today there is a far more important reason for teaching children never to put the point of a pencil in the mouth. If the point is wet it will pick up all sorts of dust. Germs are in dust. They travel as particles of dust. The pencil is thoughtlessly poked into unsanitary corners of the school desk or dropped on the floor, and then—away it goes into the child's mouth. A little crack in the lip or abrasion of the inner surface of the mouth, furnishes a lodging place for germs where they may work into the blood and serious things result.

Never moisten the tips of the fingers on the lips when counting money. The reason is apparent. And many a time a man has had blood poisoning of the face and blamed the barber shop when in reality it was through the careless habit of rubbing his fingers over his face or chewing the end of a lead pencil or wetting his fingers and counting money.

I know of a mother who scolded her little girl and told her to "never-never-as-long-as-you-live" drink out of a public drinking cup.

"But I'm so thirsty, mamma," said the little girl.

"Come with me, dear, and I will get you an ice cream soda," the indulgent mother answered, and she took the youngster in a store and fed her the ice cream from the long-handled spoon.

All the washing that spoon had received for at least four or five hours was when it was thrust into a glass of cold water after it was used. Probably twenty-five or thirty people at the least had thrust the same spoon between their lips that day. What the conditions of these people's hands and mouths were, no one knows, but with all nationalities and classes of people, one can imagine that not every one of them was a paragon of neatness or health.

This is not very pleasant to consider, but it is important. A spoon coated with germs might soak in cold water a month and not a germ would be killed. As a matter of choice, the public drinking cup is preferable to the ice cream soda spoon at the average fountain, where it is merely thrust in a glass of water between customers.

Biting the finger nails is another common danger. It is by no means a little danger. This has long been regarded as a bad habit because it spoils the nails. It does more than that, it endangers the health. Even with the very best of care, there are some germs beneath the nails. One cannot go half a day without picking up various things and every time this is done, dust and dirt and germs lodge beneath the nails.

In biting them, bits frequently sliver off into sharp points and prick the lips or gums and then the danger of blood poisoning is at hand.

The use of common soap, the soap found in hotels and other public places, is being discouraged. It is really just as dangerous as would be the use of a common tooth-brush. Better wash without soap than use a cake which scores of people have rubbed over their hands.

How many women in street cars and in shops thoughtlessly put coins in their mouths. It is extremely dangerous. And many women at their home correspondence, wet the gummed flaps of the envelopes with the tips of their tongues. These envelopes may have been gummed by machinery, as are the postage stamps, but who knows how the gum was mixed and what went into it, or what workman's fingers rubbed along the edges of the envelope?

If the child gets a splinter in his finger, he runs to mother, who invariably takes a needle or the point of a penknife and removes it. The needle may have gathered dust from the floor, or a fly with "typhoid feet" may have alighted on it. Dust flies up from the floor and settles in the work basket. The knife tip is surely far from perfectly clean. There is no great emergency in removing the splinter. Dip the needle in boiling water first, because you have to pry into the flesh with the point and into the tiny veins. If there's a germ on the tip of the needle you may force it into the hand, when blood poisoning is likely to result. Always drop a bit of antiseptic on the spot where the splinter came out.

Whenever a woman travels she is careful to take along a case for her tooth-brush. But at home she will allow it to hang uncovered in the bathroom. The maid goes in there and dusts at least a couple times a week. In summer, dust blows in from outdoors, and some of it in time may lodge in the brush and in this dust there is bound to be germs. Some of them may be of the harmful sort. Keep the tooth-brush guarded in a case in the home, just as when traveling. A little traveling case with ventilating holes in it.

But all the carelessness is not on the part of the woman. The smoker will thoughtlessly lay his cigar down on a table. He allows the burning end to extend over the edge, naturally, in order not to burn the table. The moistened end of the butt, from his lips, rests on the table. What was on the spot before? No one knows, but the smoker complacently picks up his cigar and transfers whatever germs are on it to his lips.

And this same man may chide his wife for leaving the tooth-brush exposed, while he allows his shaving brush to remain exposed. This will gather ten times as much dust as the tooth-brush, and there is always the danger of a slight scratch while shaving. The germs are mixed with the soap and rubbed into the scratch.

Sometimes you are suddenly called upon to shake hands with a stranger. To refuse is impossible. Yet, absurd as it may seem, there are times when it is advisable to wash your hands after such a hand clasp, especially if the stranger does not appeal to you as strictly hygienic.

After all, it is better to be safe than sorry. But do not get the idea from this that every germ is a monster in which either sudden or lingering death lurks. Not half the germs are dangerous; some of them are healthy, like the germs in buttermilk for instance, yet now and then the really dangerous germs float along, germs of all sorts of blood diseases and even of other diseases.

And because of this, there is always the chance that carelessness will result in contagion which develops some dreadful perhaps fatal disease. Constant care and common sense will lessen this danger to the minimum.

A bluing of clear indigo coloring rolled dry onto paper. It dissolves instantly and does not streak nor spot the garments. It is made in strips, each strip being measured to perfectly blue 3 gallons of water.

It is clean and satisfactory—no bottles to break, freeze or spill; no sediment to stain and color the clothes. Try it and all bleaching troubles will be over.

The Talcott Treasure

cians tuning merrily their fiddles in an alcove—Virginia reels, and country-dances, and cotillions, and the graceful dances of the past, before the bride was spirited away to don her going-away frock, and steal away with her husband, in his big touring car, to disappear from the haunts of men for their honeymoon, which was to be spent away off in the north woods, in a glorious camp beneath the white stars, with the river rushing by, and the pines overshadowing it; there, David declared, he would teach her the true beauty and charm of the woods that she had never seen—the wonderful woods of the great northwest.

But before they had slipped away from the merry dancers, Nancy led David Muir to a secret place, and, closing the door from all observers, confronted him with eyes that danced.

"I have somewhat to say to you, young man," quoth Nancy, "which is not fit for the ears of the public to hear—least of all, for the ears of your wife, who, something tells me, has been shamelessly deceived."

"Oh, come now, Nancy, that's a good fellow," pleaded the bridegroom, on whose face a look of alarm had flashed, "don't be too hard on a chap, you know—reserve your accusations for some time in the far future, can't you?"

"No time like the present," declared Nancy, who was fumbling in the folds of her frock for a mysterious unseen pocket. Finding this hidden receptacle, Nancy fished out something bright, and hard, and shiny and round—in other words, a gold coin, which she laid solemnly on David Muir's outstretched palm.

"Honor-bright, cross-my-heart and hope-I-may-die-if-I-tell," said Nancy, impressively, "but will you cast your eagle eye upon the date of that coin—which did not come from the top-layer of the bags taken from the—mound, but from one of the bags beneath, which, it is needless to say, were not opened—by Eleanor. I took this out merely as a lucky-piece. She never saw it—and she never will! But oh, David, David, why didn't you tell me? You'd have saved me premature white hairs, and possibly an early decease! The tortures I underwent that night were only surpassed by those endured by Eleanor, you know."

"It wouldn't have done," grinned David, shamelessly, "you'd have balked—I knew that—you've got pride of your own, young lady! And consider my feelings, will you? Great Jehosophat! When I think of going through with all I did go through, I'm amazed that my own hair isn't white! Suppose I'd gone deep enough?—but I didn't, you bet! I'm a self-convicted criminal—but for the love of Mike, don't ever tell Eleanor!"

The date on the coin was 1866—and Nancy never told!

THE END.

New Method Makes Music Amazingly Easy to Learn

Learn to Play or Sing in Spare Time at Home—Every Step Made Simple as A B C by Print-and-Picture Lessons That You Can't Go Wrong On.

TRY IT ON APPROVAL

Entire Cost Only a Few Cents a Lesson—and Nothing Whatever to Pay Unless You Are Satisfied.

HOW often have you wished that you knew how to play the violin or piano—or whatever your favorite instrument may be—or that you could take part in singing?

How many an evening's pleasure has been utterly spoiled and ruined by the admission "I can't sing," or, "No, I am sorry, but I can't play."

At all social gatherings some one is sooner or later sure to suggest music. When the others gather around for the fun, the one who can take no part feels hopelessly out of it—a wall flower—a mere listener and looker-on.

Or those long and lonesome evenings at home, when minutes seem like hours—how quickly the time would pass if you could spend it at the piano or organ—or in making a violin "talk," or in enjoying some other instrument.

And now—at last—this pleasure and satisfaction that you have so often wished for can easily be added to your daily life.

No need to join a class or pin yourself down to certain hours for lessons or practice. No need to pay a dollar or more per lesson to a private teacher. Neither the question of time nor expense is any longer a bar—every one of the obstacles that have been confining your enjoyment to mere listening have now been removed.

My method of teaching music by mail—in your spare time at home, with no strangers around to embarrass you—makes it amazingly easy to learn to sing by note or to play any instrument.

You don't need to know the first thing about music to begin—don't need to know one note from another. My method takes out all the hard part—overcomes all the difficulties—makes your progress easy, rapid and sure.

Whether for an advanced pupil or a beginner, my method is a revolutionary improvement over the old methods used by private teachers. The lessons I send you explain every point and show every step in simple Print-and-Picture form that you can't go wrong on—every step is made as clear as A B C. My method makes each step so easy to understand and practice that even children only 7 to 10 years old have quickly become accomplished players or singers under my direction by mail. Also thousands of men and women 50 to 70 years old—including many who had never before tried to play any instrument or taken a lesson of any kind—have found my method equally easy. My method is as thorough as it is easy. I teach you the only right way—teach you to play or sing by note. No "trick" music, no "numbers," no makeshifts of any kind.

Learn to Play by Note

For Beginners or Advanced Pupils

Piano,	Harmony and Composition,
Organ,	Sight Singing,
Violin,	Guitar,
Viola,	Ukulele,
Banjo,	Hawaiian Steel Guitar,
Tenor Banjo,	Harp,
Mandolin,	Cornet,
Clarinet,	Piccolo,
Flute,	Trombone.
Saxophone,
Cello,

I call my method "new"—simply because it is so radically different from the old and hard-to-understand ways of teaching music. But my method is thoroughly time tried and proven. Over 225,000 successful pupils—in all parts of the world,—and including all ages from boys and girls of 7 to 8 to men and women of 70—are the proof. Read the enthusiastic letters from some of them, which you will find printed at the right—samples of the kind of letters I am receiving in practically every mail. My file contains thousands of such letters. Largely through the recommendations of satisfied pupils, I have built up the largest school of music in the world.

But I don't ask you to judge my methods by what others say or by what I myself say. You can take any course on trial—singing or any instrument you prefer—and judge entirely by your own progress. If for any reason you are not satisfied with the course or with what you learn from it, then it won't cost you a single penny. I guarantee satisfaction. On the other hand, if you are not pleased with the course, the total cost amounts to only a few cents a lesson, with your music and everything also included.

When learning to play or sing is so easy, why continue to confine your enjoyment of music to mere listening? Why not at least let me send you my free book that tells you all about my methods? I know you will find this book absorbingly interesting, simply because it shows you how easy it is to turn your wish to play or sing into an actual fact. Just now I am making a special short-time offer that cuts the cost per lesson in two—send your name now before this special offer is gone. No obligation—simply use the coupon or send your name and address in a letter or on a post-card. Instruments supplied when needed, cash or credit.

Crisholm's Adventure on New Year's Eve

By Joseph F. Novak

See front cover illustration.

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"WHEN I feel blue, I try to make someone happy."

The thought came to Marshall Crisholm as he sat in the parlors of the Genevra Club. The thought was not his own. He had heard it voiced by a pretty salesgirl in a haberdashery store that morning when he went to buy a pair of gloves.

But not of the salesgirl is this story, except that it was her remark that led to the amazing adventure Crisholm indulged that night.

Marshall was feeling blue. And when a man, possessed of a fine personality, millions of dollars and plenty of friends feels blue, there is but one reason for it—a girl.

It was Miss Diana George in his case. He loved her yet was at a loss as to how to woo her, because she was like unto the goddess after whom she was named, beautiful, clever, very independent and seemingly beyond the allurements of love. Nor was she given to clinging-vine tendencies and Marshall was afraid sentimentality would be frowned upon if he used it to gain her.

And then, while he was trying to make up his mind as to best ways and means, along came Monroe Arbuckle, fresh from the West. It cannot be gainsaid that Arbuckle "had a way with him" that was refreshing—he could laugh heartily and no one would be shocked; he could be bluff and such a solecism was forgiven him, and he had a way of talking with women that savored of his manner of talking with men which was rather engaging and so naturally all the girls took to him. Had they known where he acquired that manner they might have shuddered, but they did not and thought it quite novel and refreshing.

Crisholm often felt like punching Earle Barrett's head for introducing the bounder (as he thought of Monroe Arbuckle) into their set, but the thing was done and the westerner and his millions were admitted everywhere. The worst of it was that Diana seemed to be taken with him, and when Marshall called upon her and told of two tempting seats which he had secured for the opera for New Year's Eve and a table reserved at the Sunken Gardens, quite the smartest restaurant in town, she refused, saying that she had already accepted Arbuckle's invitation to escort her to the Gardeners' New Year Eve Ball. That was quite the limit, and as Crisholm couldn't decide whether her regret was sincere or merely formal, he felt murderous and no doubt one easily guesses who the victim would have been had he carried his feelings into practice.

He had not much time to mull about it, however, for he was a young and energetic business man, but now with the evening coming on, and the thought of Diana being in Arbuckle's company that night, he was plunged into the very depths of the blues.

"When I feel blue, I try to make someone happy."

Suppose he were to try the experiment? But who could he make happy? Surely none of the people all about him. They were loaded down with riches, but in spite of that were either downright discontented or else had developed a calm acceptance of that horrible state, satiated selfishness. No bluebird of happiness roosted in their homes—or, perhaps more to the point, their apartments.

Crisholm dawled about a bit longer, then with a snort of disgust, he got up, called for his hat and coat and went outside.

It was bitterly cold, but the air was chastely clear and the stars were brilliant. He hailed a taxi and got into it.

Being a truly democratic chap, he did not hold the taxi-driver at a distance, but at once engaged him in conversation.

"I suppose you boys will have a pretty busy night of it," he began, "but nothing to what it used to be on New Year's morning before prohibition went into effect, eh?"

"Yes, sir," the driver responded civilly. "'Twas a caution some of the things we bumped up against in those days. Where do you want to go?"

"Oh, I don't know. I just want to kill time."

"And on New Year's Eve?" the chauffeur murmured.

Crisholm caught the murmur.

"Could you suggest how I could spend the evening?"

"Well, I know how I would if I had the money," the chauffeur said.

"How?"

"Well, I'd go to a show and get the best seats. Then afterwards, I'd go to a swell restaurant and have a bully feed. Gee, that'd make me and the wife happy."

"Suppose you do it then?" suggested Crisholm.

"What do you mean?" queried the chauffeur.

"Just this: I've got a couple of seats for the opera. 'The Jewels of the Madonna' is to be sung and it is a spectacular opera, so that if you don't understand the music, you'll enjoy the wonderful stage pictures. I've also got a table reserved at the Sunken Gardens and supper ordered for two, so that the only expense you'll have will be to tip the waiter—and I'll give you ten dollars for that. Do you want to go in my stead and take your wife with you?"

"Quit your kidding," the chauffeur retorted.

"I'm not kidding," Crisholm protested, "I'm in earnest."

"What will I do with my car? Take it back to the garage and tell them I want the evening off? I see where my job'd be tomorrow."

"I'll take your place as chauffeur!"

"Gosh, fellow, you ain't crazy, are you?" queried the chauffeur in alarm.

"Not at all, but I'm sick of those things that you'd enjoy. And I, in turn, would relish the experiences you would have tonight at your job as taxi-driver. Turn around and go back to the club. I'll loan you my dress suit and I'll put on your togs."

"What?" he exclaimed, jamming on his brakes so suddenly that the machine skidded.

"Just what I said. Will you do it?"

"No," the driver returned shortly, now evidently convinced that he was driving a lunatic.

"Come on, now," Marshall coaxed. "I'm not 'nutty.' I'm just bored to death and want to forget something that won't be forgotten."

"How do I know you're responsible? I turn over to you a taxi-cab worth several thousand dollars——"

"Let me identify myself then. My name is Marshall Crisholm and I have offices in the Reddiston Building, I live at the Genevra Club. Look at these cards of membership in various clubs and associations that I carry. See my initials in my hat, my coat and dress suit. They serve to identify me, do they not?"

The driver sat up at all these genuine references, and looked half inclined to give in to the wild suggestion.

"Drive to the club," Crisholm said, "we'll make the change and both be happy in doing each other's work.

His wheedling tone won. The driver turned about and in a short time they were before the Genevra Club.

Crisholm was admitted deferentially by the doorman, and was greeted by his mates as he passed them to the elevator.

"If you want further identification," he said as they stood waiting for the elevator, "look! Here is my picture with my name below it," and he pointed it out in a large frame which contained the photographs of all the club's members.

This dispelled the last doubt in the chauffeur's mind and he entered into the spirit of the thing.

"What's your name?" Crisholm queried as they entered his apartments.

"Dan Kent," the chauffeur replied.

"Well, Kent, here we are. Are you game?"

"Yes!" Kent exclaimed. "But let me call up my wife, so's she can get ready. I got her a classy party dress for Christmas so I guess she'll go all right."

He did so.

"She thinks I'm crazy," he said as he hung up the receiver, "but she'll be ready when we come. What excuse will I make to the Company?"

"Tell them that Marshall Crisholm, who has a charge account with them, has taken your car for the entire evening and you'll report when he dismisses you."

Again Kent 'phoned, then:

"All right, again," he announced.

"Then let's change clothes," Crisholm said.

Kent was a clean-cut young fellow, with a handsome, good-natured face. So that when the change was effected, outside a little self-consciousness he made quite an acceptable clubman, while Crisholm fitted the role of chauffeur even as well, except, perhaps, that he looked somewhat too refined and intelligent for his job.

They left the club and soon were speeding down the street, and the way Crisholm handled the cab assured Kent that he had left the machine in experienced hands. It was not long before they reached Kent's home, where they picked up Mrs. Kent. Then tracks were made for the opera house, which was reached just in time for the overture.

"I'll pick you up at the Sunken Gardens at any time you're ready after one o'clock," Crisholm said as he drove off.

He was filled with the excitement of the thing.

"I ought to see some sights tonight," he commented.

As he drove along, his eyes fell upon the flashing electric sign of the Lariat & Pommel Club, a rather blatant organization patronized by western millionaires and at which Arbuckle was staying.

"I wish that chump would want a taxi. Wouldn't I like to get him for a fare! I'd drive like the devil and try to break his neck," he thought, Christianly.

Now, perhaps fate was waiting to call his bluff, for just then Arbuckle did emerge from the club and hailed.

Crisholm scrambled to get him.

"Where to?" he asked respectfully, keeping his face as well hidden as he could.

"No. 3709 South Drive," was the reply.

Diana's home! Crisholm's heart gave a jump. Was he going to take her to the New Year Dance in an ordinary taxi? But that was just like the bounder.

However, he only nodded and drove to the address. Arbuckle got down and went into the house.

What torture Crisholm suffered. He thought of his rival's reception, while he sat, a menial, awaiting the word to take them to the gay New Year Dance.

In a few moments, through the great glass doors, Diana appeared, with Arbuckle behind her. What a picture she made in the glow of the hall lights! She was gowned in white and silver, with a great bird of paradise in her hair. And how gracefully she drew on her opera wrap, a thing of deep old rose lined with delicate yellow and topped with white fur! Her very movements were enough to quicken one's heart beats!

The couple descended and entered the cab.

"Take the North Drive, son," Arbuckle said, "and I'll give you further instructions later on."

The North Drive! That was not not the way to the Gardeners'! "The bounder is going to propose and wants to have her all to himself so that she can decide before they get to the dance," Crisholm thought, as he savagely jammed in the clutch and started the car. "But I'll listen, and find out if he does."

He drove very carefully, for he had a most precious fare now. The streets were icy and the chains crunched on the slippery pavement. Soon the North Drive was reached, snowy, deserted and dark, for something was the matter with the electric lights and they were not illuminated.

Crisholm shamelessly listened to the conversation of the couple in the machine, noting the little hints which Arbuckle dropped, but which Diana simply ignored, until the westerner without mincing words further, flatly proposed.

"Why, Mr. Arbuckle!" Crisholm heard Diana say, "have my actions been such to warrant the honor you wish to confer?" There was no surprise, however, in her voice.

"You accepted my invitations and I thought I had a right to hope."

"I did that because I considered you a stranger entitled to our courtesy."

"But now that I have broached the subject, you really do not find me objectionable, do you?" he asked.

Diana paused, and Crisholm clutched the wheel so tightly that, had it been green wood, he'd have crushed water from it.

"Hardly," Diana replied at length, and her voice told the pseudo-chauffeur that she was placing Arbuckle's heart in the discard where she had been obliged to put so many other unsolicited ones.

But Arbuckle did not know the tone, for he continued eagerly:

"Then I may hope?"

"No, Mr. Arbuckle," very quietly but firmly. "I like you very well and I believe that it was the fact that you treated and spoke to me as man to man that made me more liberal in my acceptances of your favors than I otherwise would have been."

"Then you don't feel about this as I do?"

(If Crisholm had been in a position to do so, he would have knocked the man down.)

With hauteur, Diana replied:

"I don't like your tone, Mr. Arbuckle."

"Say, Miss, I've been bragging around the Lariat & Pommel Club that I was going to marry you, and I'm going to. The boys said I'd have a time, but I know how we do things out West. If we want a girl, we get her——"

"You insulting brute!" Diana cried angrily. "Chauffeur! Stop! I wish to get down."

"You go on driving, you shrimp!" stormed Arbuckle, "or I'll blow your head off! See?" and he whipped out a revolver.

"Oh, don't shoot!" begged Crisholm in terror, "I'll do what you want! Don't kill me. I got a wife an' kid an' I'm their only support."

"Well, behave yourself, but remember, I'm pretty quick with a gun."

"You coward!" Diana blazed at the chauffeur.

"I'm sorry, lady," Crisholm whined, "but I got a wife an' kid an' I'm——"

"Shut up and keep your eyes peeled for a minister's house."

"How can you marry me without a marriage license?"

"Who said I didn't have one?" Arbuckle queried. "I got it this morning." He took the license from his inside pocket, displayed it, then thrust it back.

"I'll never consent to marrying you. I'll tell the minister of your contemptible conduct."

"You'd better consent for I'll make him go through the ceremony even at the point of a gun," Arbuckle retorted.

"Your cave-man wooing is not without interest," Diana remarked, veiled contempt in her voice. "I hardly expected that I was going to commence the New Year as a bride."

"Well, it's a good time. And you might make a resolution to look up to me as a dutiful wife should and forget those notions of independence and being an old maid. You see, a woman's independence is nothing when she gets into the power of a strong man."

There was an element of truth in this. Diana made no reply.

"Say, you mutt," Arbuckle went on, addressing Crisholm, "are you watching for a minister's shingle?"

"I just was going to tell you I saw one," Crisholm said. "I——I——wish you wouldn't point that gun at me, sir. I'm afraid it might accidentally go off, sir, an' I got a wife an' kid dependent upon me, sir."

"Shut up and drive up to the house."

Crisholm did. In the window of the little house, an illuminated sign told the world that John Cloverdale of ——— Church resided there.

"There you are, sir, an' sir——kin——kin I go back to my wife an' kid, sir?"

"You stay here and take my directions."

"Yes, sir," Crisholm replied very humbly. "But may I cover the engine, sir, so she'll keep warm sir?"

"Go ahead."

Arbuckle and Diana had gotten out of the taxi. Now they waited while the trembling chauffeur lifted the seat and drew from under it a blanket. His terror was so evident that Arbuckle laughed brutally and dropped his revolver into his pocket.

"Come on," he ordered, and they started for the house, Crisholm following with a hang-dog air.

But they had not observed that their chauffeur had filched a heavy little tool from the machine. So while they stood on the porch waiting for someone to answer their ring, something suddenly landed with a thwack that crushed in Arbuckle's hat and crumpled him upon the floor.

And then when the door was opened, the light fell upon the spectacle of a chauffeur evidently robbing his victim. And to the terrified minister who had opened the door, Crisholm said:

"Tell this bird when he comes to that we've got the goods on him and if he doesn't check out tomorrow (if he's able) somebody'll see that he does. He ain't goin' to scare me for nothin', me with a wife an' kid to support." He thrust the marriage license inside his coat, then suddenly caught up the dumbfounded Diana in his arms, rushed with her to the taxi, placed her in it, slammed the door and started like Jehu for her home, all the while listening and standing ready to assist her if she should faint or develop hysterics.

But Diana did not, and so he continued to drive, and after a while her home was reached.

Crisholm got down and respectfully opened the door.

"I got you from here, ma'am, so I'm bringin' you back," he said.

"Come into the house, my good man," Diana said, "you have rendered me a service and I must see how I can reward you."

"Yes'm," and Crisholm followed her into the house and to the library, where she lit the lamps and then pressed the electric button which set the electric radiator in the grate to glowing.

"Sit down, my friend, and tell me how I can repay you," and waving her hand to a chair that stood beside the grate, Diana sank wearily into one opposite it and closed her eyes.

"You kin repay me, ma'am," he began humbly, "by bein' good to Mr. Crisholm, and giving him the right to protect you the rest of your life. He loves you but doesn't know how to go about wooing you. He was afraid sentimentality would be frowned upon and evidently cave-man stuff can't do the trick, either. Tell me, Diana, where is the path to your heart?"

When he started to speak, Diana listened with closed eyes; then as he continued she sat erect and then finally ejaculated.

"Marshall Crisholm! What are you doing in chauffeur's livery? I thought I had been rescued by a man who had a wife and child. And you follow with a proposal after that—that—other?"

"It is because I love you, Diana, love you as I never loved you before. Shall I tell you what led up to this wild adventure?" And then when she nodded, he told her the whole story.

And at its close, he finished:

"Diana, Diana, have I a chance? Can I show it? Can I prove it?"

He was very earnest now, and going up to her, he stood before her, his hands clasped, his eyes burning.

And Diana, looking away, said demurely:

"I think you have already shown and proved it."

"Then how—how may I claim you?"

She looked at him, then threw her hands from her and stood, in surrender.

He caught her to his heart and she nestled there.

"I think it was my name, Marshall, she whispered. "Everyone thought I considered myself beyond the allurements of love. I did want the love of a good, true, honest man, but those who courted my favor were not the ones I wanted. I think I must have unconsciously been waiting for you, for your kisses and the feel of your protecting arms about me."

Crisholm renewed his caress.

"It pays to try and make others happy," he said.

"Those poor people will be wondering why you do not come," Diana reminded. "The man will probably want his livery back so to be at work tomorrow."

"This livery hallowed by the touch of your dear face?" Crisholm exclaimed aghast. "He'll never get it. It is too sacred. "I'll buy it from him."

"To think that I am allowing that 'cowardly chauffeur' with a wife and child to embrace me," murmured Diana.

"I'm some actor, eh, what?" Crisholm said. "I guess Arbuckle thought he had me completely buffaloed."

"I wonder if we'll see him again?" and Diana shuddered.

"Just let him come around. I'll use that wrench with such force next time that he won't ever wake up."

Just then there came from outside the crash of church bells, the blare of whistles and the firing of shots.

"New Year's morning has dawned," Diana said. "Must I let you go to get those people? I'm afraid I don't want to let you."

"We'll call them up at the Sunken Gardens and make it all right. My role of chauffeur has been played out with the dying of the year. I assume my new one tomorrow, your accepted lover," he whispered.

"It will start a new year for me, too," Diana replied, snuggling closer. "Oh, Marshall, my dear! It is so pleasant to be just a woman!"

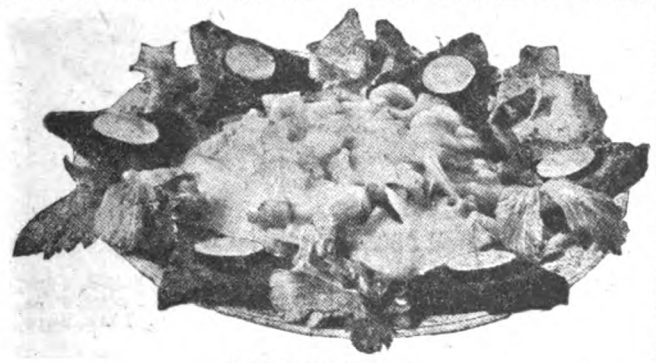
Two Wonderful Foods

SNOW MAN FOR THE CHILDREN.



Milk and Potatoes

By Violet Marsh

Milk the Cheapest of Animal Foods

WHETHER the use of less milk will reduce the cost of living is at the present time a much mooted question. The producer who finds the cost of production constantly increasing may be tempted to reserve less milk for family consumption, and the housewife who pays a higher cash price per quart for milk may be tempted to cut down the family allowance. Let us therefore come to a clearer understanding of what a complete variety of necessary body building material milk contains and then decide whether, as a matter of economy, we shall reduce or increase the family supply.

It is a commonplace saying that "milk is a perfect food," and if given a right place in the diet, this statement is entirely true. Milk contains materials which children need for growth and which young and old alike need for the repair of their bodily machinery. Milk also supplies heat and the energy necessary for work. It should not be understood, however, to mean that it has these ingredients in such proportions that it can serve satisfactory as an exclusive food for a grown person or even a child. Comparing the nutritive values of animal food, one quart of milk supplies practically as much of both fuel and energy as three quarters of a pound of beef of average composition or eight average eggs. Thus, while other animal foods (meat, eggs and cheese) are desirable to give variety to the diet, it may be assumed that milk may be used as an economical substitute for any one of them, and when combined with the vegetable foods as in milk soups, chowders, and gravies, milk will be found the cheapest animal food when considered from a nutritive standpoint. Again, from the point of view of the need of the body, it is extravagant to add milk to the bill of fare when meat, meat soups, milk custards or milk sauces on vegetables are served.

What Milk Contains

The tendency to think of milk as a beverage rather than as an important source of nourishment comes partly, no doubt, from the fact that it is a liquid rather than a solid, and that most liquid foods, such as clear soup, coffee and tea, contain very little that feeds the body. It is natural, therefore, to associate milk with these rather than with the really nourishing food materials. Hence it may be helpful to get an idea of the classes into which the solids contained in milk are divided. These are: (1) proteids, (2) fats, (3) sugar, and (4) mineral matter. The fat and sugar serve as fuel, and the mineral matter is chiefly valuable for the making of bones and teeth and serves certain other physiological purposes. The proteids serve as fuel like the fats and sugar, but they are used also to make and repair the muscular tissues of the body. This double usefulness indicates why proteids are so often referred to as the most important part of milk.

SAUSAGE AND BROWNED POTATOES.

If all the water were to be driven off from a quart of whole milk, there would be left about half a cupful of the very best food substances, including butter fat, a kind of sugar not so sweet as granulated sugar and known as "milk sugar," and also materials which are needed to make muscles, bones, teeth, and other parts of the body. Besides all this nourishment, milk contains a very small amount of a substance or substances now thought to help the body of the child to make good use of other foods. Apparently nothing can serve so well as the basis for the diet of the healthy child.

The Practical Use of Milk in the Diet—with Recipes

BREAD AND MILK.—This may well be the chief, if not the only, dish in the supper of little children. If the milk is not very rich, the bread should be spread with butter. Use well-baked bread, at least a day old, or toast, or occasionally crackers. In cases of fatigue, or when colds or other causes destroy the appetite, a bowl of bread or cracker and milk in place of other foods is highly advisable.

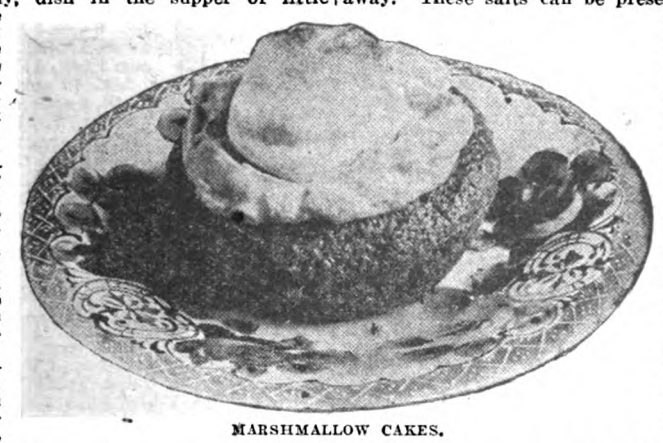
SKIM MILK.—Fresh skim milk may be used in all recipes calling for milk, for in gravies and soups the addition of butter restores the whole milk flavor. For those who cannot digest a beverage with a content of fat such as found in whole milk, cocoa, or chocolate, skim milk will prove most valuable, and if allowed to thicken and then beaten with an egg beater with the addition of a little sugar and cinnamon, a delicious food and beverage is obtained. Skimmed sour milk is an excellent liver tonic, as also is buttermilk. Rice, cooked in an uncovered double boiler, or in a pan in a very slow oven, can be made to absorb about six times its volume of skim milk. No water is used.

MILK GRAVY.—There are two ways of making milk gravy. One is to melt two tablespoons of butter, then smooth into this two of dry flour, and when it bubbles add one cup of hot milk slowly. Cook several minutes. The second way is to bring the milk to a scald in double boiler and then slowly add the flour previously mixed with a little cold milk. Add the butter and a little salt. Many also like the addition of a little cheese. This gravy is used on vegetables fish, crisp toast, and baked potatoes.

MILK SOUPS.—A large variety of soups may be made the means of utilizing not only whole or skim milk, but also left-over portions of vegetables, cooked cereal, rice, or a bit of fish. In making them, allow one half tablespoon of flour to each cup of liquid including milk and the juice and pulp of vegetables, and one level tablespoon or more of butter. Onions, corn, asparagus, spinach, peas, beans, celery, or a little dried fish which has been soaked and freshened, make excellent soups.

KOUMYS.—Warm until tepid in double boiler one quart of sweet milk then stir into it one tablespoon of sugar, a pinch of salt, and one sixth of a compressed yeast cake which has been dissolved in a tablespoon of tepid water. Divide equally into three pint bottles; cork and tie in the corks. Place on sides for twenty-four hours where the temperature is about eighty degrees. Shake occasionally. Chill before serving.

Appreciation of Our Good Friend the Potato



We are told that Columbus on his first voyage of discovery searched eagerly for gold at all places at which he touched in the New World. He found very little gold. But among the specimens of the natural products of America which he brought back to Spain in his ship was the potato, which, wrote Washington Irving, was worth more to the poor of the world than all the gold that was ever dug.

Every housewife can add her tribute to that of Irving in appreciation of the potato which is as valuable as it is common.

From the point of view of dietetics, potatoes furnish starch in a readily digestible form. They also contain mineral substances of importance to the body, and—a fact less generally known—tend to make the tissues and fluids of the body alkaline, so counteracting the tendency of meat, eggs, fish and like foods to create acid conditions. Since the body does its work best when its condition is either neutral or slightly alkaline, potatoes, like most vegetables, perform an important function in the diet besides furnishing energy-producing material. This scientific fact justifies the custom that is prevalent in most families of serving a goodly supply of potatoes with each helping of meat.

Potatoes, however, while a valuable addition to a mixed diet, alone are not suited to meet the needs of the body because of their poverty in proteins and fat. Of these latter important elements, protein is furnished in meats, eggs, fish, milk, beans, peas and similar foods, and fat in butter, bacon, table oils, and the fats and oils used in cookery.

Greater care than is commonly exercised should be taken in peeling potatoes. Very often twenty per cent of the potato is pared away. This results not only in the waste of considerable potato but also in the loss of one of the most valuable portions of the tuber, since the soluble mineral salts are present in the material near the skin, which would be removed and thrown away. These salts can be preserved by a more careful removal of the skin, as by shallow paring and rubbing, and also by boiling or baking the potatoes in their jackets.

MARSHMALLOW CAKES.

Quite often in a pan of potatoes will be found several of a bright green tinge, or one end only will be green. This not being the natural potato color, the housewife is sometimes uncertain as to their wholesomeness. The fact is that such potatoes have been exposed to the light and will have a better flavor next to the skin. Regarding this taste, also about potato water and potato skins, I will quote from Dr. Wiley in Good Housekeeping: "The potato sprouts and fruits contain a bitter glucosid, solanin, which in large quantities is considered poisonous. When potatoes are exposed to warmth and light, this bitter principle is developed. It is found also in the eyes and in some instances in the skin. There is no danger whatever in using the water in which potatoes have been boiled, provided they have not commenced to grow and the eyes have been cut out. Aside from flavor, there is another objection to throwing away the potato water. It contains soluble vitamins and minerals which give to potato skins one of their chief hygienic values."

How to Cook Potatoes

Steaming and baking cause the least loss of food value.

BOILED POTATOES.—Select potatoes of uniform size, wash and scrub with a brush. Slice the peel from the seed end. Drop into boiling salted water; just enough to cover. Cook until soft but not broken. Drain at once and set uncovered on back of stove to dry off.

BAKED POTATOES.—Put into moderately hot oven. When soft, pierce several times with a fork so that the steam will escape and prevent the potatoes becoming watery and unwholesome.

MASHED POTATO.—Boil, and mash into same kettle which should be kept on back of stove. To each pint of mashed potato add a scant half teaspoon of salt, one tablespoon of butter, a little pepper, and hot cream or milk to moisten. Beat with a spoon or fork until light.

POTATOES AU GRATIN.—Bake medium-sized potatoes, cut a slice from each side and scoop out the inside. Season with butter, a little hot cream, salt and pepper, and to every three potatoes add the beaten white of an egg. Refill the potato shells which have been kept hot in the oven, sprinkle with grated cheese and bread-crumbs, dot with butter and return to oven to brown.

POTATO SOUP.—Pare, boil and mash four potatoes. Scald together in a double boiler three cups of milk, two teaspoons of minced onion, one teaspoon of salt, one half teaspoon of celery salt, a dash of cayenne pepper, and a pinch of white pepper. Add mashed potato. In a saucepan put three tablespoons of butter and when it warms and just bubbles, work in one and a half tablespoons of dry flour. Add to milk and potato and cook five minutes. More milk may be added if too thick.

HASHED-BROWN POTATOES.—Hash the potatoes very fine but do not mash. Put only a little fat in a frying pan which must be very hot when the potatoes are put in. Smooth into a thick, even layer and do not disturb until a thick crust is formed on the bottom, then fold once, omelet style, and serve.

POTATO SCALLOP.—Slice raw potatoes very thin; about one quart. Place a layer of potato in the bottom of a baking dish, sprinkle lightly with dry flour, a little salt, pepper and butter. Repeat layers until the potatoes are all used, and then pour over enough rich milk to cover. Cover and bake in a moderately hot oven about one hour. Remove cover the last twenty minutes to allow potatoes to brown. At no time should the potato boil, but kept at a simmering heat. Some like the addition of a little cheese to this dish.

SARATOGA POTATOES.—Peel and slice thin and soak in cold water. Drain and dry in towels. Fry a few at a time in deep hot fat. Sprinkle with salt as they are taken out. These are very nice cold.

SAUSAGE AND BROWNED POTATOES.—Make your own sausage meat if you want to know what you are eating. Weigh meat carefully, allowing one third the amount of fat that there is lean. Use only good, sweet pork. Put through meat chopper, using the fine cutter. To each pound of meat, use one scant tablespoon of salt, one scant half teaspoon of white pepper and one tablespoon of finely sifted sage. The home dried sage is the best. Sausage meat will keep the best in cotton bags. These are made by sewing together strips of clean white cloth, washing again and then dipping into a solution of strong hot salt and water. Dry, and then fill closely with the meat, pressing it in with a round, flat-headed stick the size of the bag.

Boil potatoes, steam dry and peel. Bake sausages in a hot oven in a shallow pan, and when half done, drain off most of the fat, and put the hot boiled potatoes in the pan to brown while the sausages finish cooking.

See What it Does for Your Teeth

This is to urge a ten-day test of a new, scientific tooth cleaner.

You have found, no doubt, that brushed teeth still discolor and decay. The methods you use are inadequate. There is now a better way.

The cause of most tooth troubles is a film. It is ever-present, ever-forming. You can feel it with your tongue.

That film is what discolors—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

That film is clinging. It gets into crevices and stays. So, despite your brushing, it may do a ceaseless damage. Teeth are safer, whiter and cleaner if that film is absent.

Science Now Combats it

Dental science, after years of searching, has found a way to combat film. Years of careful tests under able authorities have amply proved its efficiency. Now leading dentists all over America are urging its adoption. It is now used daily on millions of teeth.

This film combatant is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And a 10-Day Tube is offered to every home for testing.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to day by day combat it.

For long this method seemed impossible. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But science has discovered a harmless activating method. And that discovery opens a new teeth-cleaning era.

The results are quickly apparent. A ten-day test is convincing. We urge you to make it at our cost and learn what clean teeth mean. Lest you forget, cut out the coupon now.

Repeat from first row for length desired.

Crocheting into Tape

An idea which will be appreciated by busy mothers who wish to have their children's clothes dainty, is passed on by a COMFORT sister.

Instead of crocheting directly into the edge of flannel skirts or other garments, work into a narrow tape, then when the garment is worn out the trimming can be transferred very easily, as often a well-made crocheted lace outwears a garment.

CROCHETING INTO TAPE.

The edging illustrated is made as follows:

Fasten thread to tape, ch 5, turn, shell 7 d c in 3rd st, sl st to edge of tape, turn, ch 3, 1 s c in 4 d c, ch 3, turn, 7 d c in last st, ch 3, 1 sl st in tape, repeat.

Deeper edging can be made in the same way.

New Bibs for Baby

Fashions even effect such little things as baby's bibs, and this being so, the small ones which required pinning to keep in position have given place to an improved style.

This new model is either pointed or rounded and then either side of the front a band extends around the body, under the arms, and fastens in the back.

Sheer linen or batiste lace trimmed and made up over a cotton, padded under bib, or heavier linen or pique may be used.

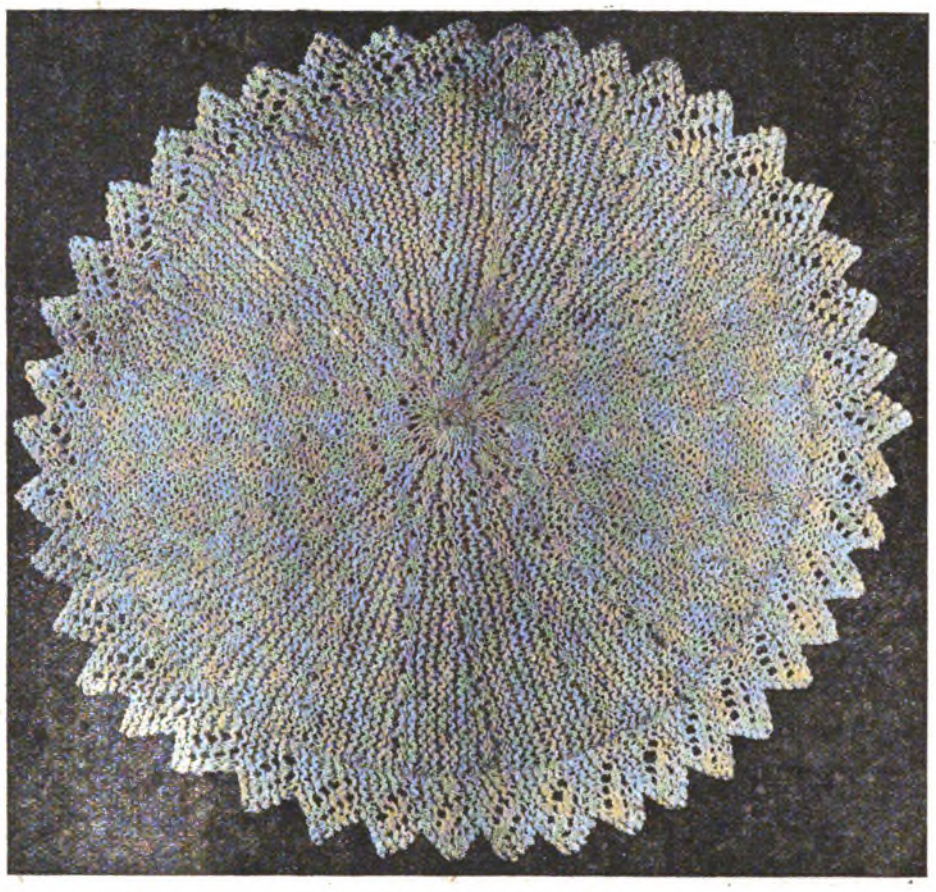
Large Knitted Doily

BY MRS. ANNIE OSGOOD.

This mat is made in twenty sections or gores.

Use No. 12 knitting cotton and No. 16 steel needles.

Cast on 31 stitches.



1st rib.—K 4, turn, k back.

2nd rib.—K 7, turn, k back.

3rd rib.—K 10, turn, k back.

Continue in this way adding three stitches to each rib until but three of the original stitches remain; knit these and then purl back.

Repeat from the beginning until there are 20 gores. Bind off and sew together.

Sleeping Socks

For loose socks which will reach half way up to the calf of the leg, one will need two ounces of Shetland floss and a medium bone needle.

Make 44 chain and work 44 double crochet into it. Turn, and work double crochet into the other side of the chain stitches. Join neatly, then work double crochet around, taking up only the top portion of each stitch throughout. Work 17 rows in all.

In the 18th row turn back after the 22nd double crochet, and with one chain at each turning work 12 rows to and fro on these 22. Turn wrong side out and, putting the two corners of this piece together, connect the two sides with a row of double crochet.

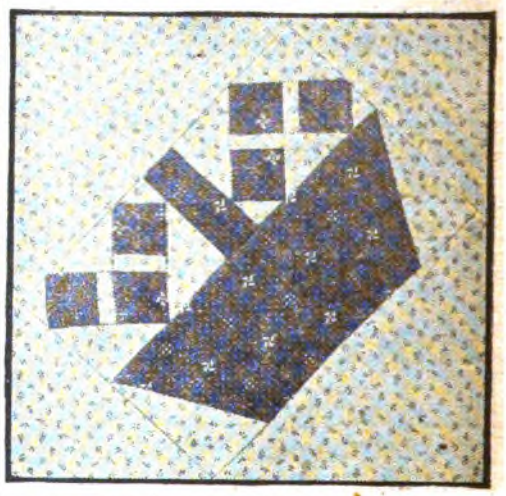
Break off the thread and join to the center of the heel—that is, to the connecting stitches—and work a row of double crochet down the side of the heel into each double crochet across the front and up the other side; continue working around and decrease one in each second round at the corner between heel and front until the stitches are reduced to 38.

Work 10 rows of 38 double crochet in each; then, making 18 for the back and 18 for the front, narrow stitch between by taking it up with the 18th and working the two loops as one.

Decrease in the same place in every second row for 10 rows; then, placing the two edges together, connect with a row of double crochet on the wrong side, rounding off the corners.

Fasten the thread to the joining at the top of the sock, make one double crochet, miss one double crochet on the edge, and put * 6 treble into the next, miss 1, 1 double crochet into the next, miss 1, and repeat from *.

These socks are not meant to fit exactly; the directions here given are for about a four or five foot. If yours is very small or very large, measure accordingly.



Quilt Block in Basket of Flowers Design

BY JANIE BECKER.

For the basket and flowers any color may be used but will look more natural if tan is used for the basket and different colors for the squares representing the flowers, not more than two being the same color, or each one may be different, one pink, one blue, yellow, red, lavender, etc. Before piecing, the basket measures eleven inches long at upper edge, five and three-fourths at lower edge, and four inches wide; the handle three inches long and one and one-half inches wide.

The pieces for flowers one and three-fourths inches square, the narrow pieces between flowers not quite seven-eighths inches wide, and there are three sizes of half squares besides the large one at each corner.

The light piece at each end of the basket is four and one-half inches long on the straight edge and two and three-fourths inches wide at lower edge.

The piecing is all straight seams, no corners to turn.

Instructions for Stockinette Stitch

Ravel both edges until all stitches are perfectly clear. Thread needle with one of the ravelings, then thrust the needle down through one stitch and up through the stitch next to it, then do the same on the opposite side—down through one and up through the next—then back to the first side, place the needle down by the side of the thread in the stitch where you brought the needle up before and bring it up in the stitch next to it, then do the same on the opposite side. Down through one up through the next, then do the same on the opposite side. But if the thread is drawn up just right, one would have to hunt for the knot to find where a garment was mended if done with the stockinette stitch.

By means of this stitch one can mend any knit goods invisibly, make over underwear for children, and repair gloves without a seam.—Mrs. S. C. Talbot.

Why We Celebrate New Year's Day

By C. L. Cheever

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"WHERE did our holidays come from?" so many ask. That depends; we all know how the celebration of July 4th came about and how old Thanksgiving Day is; we understand why we ought to honor the birthdays of Washington and Lincoln and why we keep Memorial Day. But these are all American holidays—what about this one that is just at hand and that is celebrated all over the world, New Year's Day?

We shall have to go back a long way to find the beginning of this day, and we will start with a man, Martin by name, who lived at least 1600 years ago. He was a bishop of the Christian church—that was a new thing in the year 316—and it is said that he worked miracles and did other wonderful things, and suffered much for the sake of the new religion, so that afterward the Roman church set apart a day, a saint's day, on November 11, in which his memory was to be honored, and called it Martinmas. One of the sweetest legends of those old days is the story of St. Martin and the beggar. The bishop was riding along and a beggar asked alms of him. Noticing how cold the man was and how poorly clad, the saint tore his cloak in two and gave him half of it. The next night there was a vision given to the bishop and he saw Christ Himself with the piece of cloak about him telling the story of the saint and the beggar to a group of angels.

St. Martin was very dear to the Germans and they decided to make his feast day, which you remember was Nov. 11, a day in which to celebrate the birth of the New Year. That arrangement was appropriate enough, for the Germans, like other early peoples, divided their year into two seasons, winter and summer. The winter season began in November, when the ground was barren and frozen and they were compelled to drive cattle and sheep to shelter because the pasture was all gone. At this time of year they changed their whole mode of living; they deserted the fields and gathered around their own firesides, and there were all sorts of festivities and amusements. Other nations looking on, adopted the idea of making the winter season a time of jollity, beginning with Martinmas, and soon the celebration of the day became popular in Gaul and Britain.

Meanwhile, down in Rome they had made a calendar which placed January first at the beginning of the year. They called the month Januarius, in honor of their god Janus, a deity with two faces, one looking forward, the other looking backward. That was a suitable idea, for we of today follow the example of Janus and look both ways on December 31.

Presently the Romans swept up into Germany, bringing with them many of their customs, which were afterward adopted by the natives. Festivals became more and more common, but we are told that the one that fell on Martinmas was the jolliest of them all.

After a time the Roman calendar was accepted, and then the New Year's festivities fell on January 1, though it was not for hundreds of years that the legal beginning of the year was fixed on that date for the whole world.

Eating and drinking had a good deal to do with the New Year celebration, but gifts were made, especially to sovereigns, and they say that Queen Elizabeth replenished her closets and jewel cases every New Year's Day. Gloves were a favorite gift to ladies, and they were as expensive in those early days as any part of a wardrobe. The sports of the time were rough indeed. "St. Martin's game" was a boar fight. The people went in crowds and watched two boars inclosed in a ring, fight until they had torn each other to pieces. When it was over the meat was distributed to the spectators.

By a remarkable coincidence the most of the world has revived the celebration of November eleventh because of it being the anniversary of the surrender of Germany which ended the World War.

Comfort's League of Cousins

of Miles Standish, Cotton Mather, etc., from their old homes. New England is rapidly becoming New Ireland, but the Irishman does not have it all his own way, for there are more Greeks in Lowell than there are in Corinth (Greece, not Mississippi, if you please), and the factory hands of the latter city and of Lawrence are almost entirely foreigners, who will hike for home, as is customary with these peoples of eastern Europe, as soon as they have made their pile. It is hard to determine just where the banana belt begins or ends, but, oh joy! the spooney belt and the love and romance belt start right at the Mason and Dixon line, and, Mary, you have evidently got that belt tightly clasped around you. I am strong for belts, but I strenuously object to getting my hands all tangled up in a jungle of pins, and I never knew a safety-pin that did not have its business and waiting ready to jab a fellow. Of course all real girls like boys and all real boys like girls, but the girl that's boy crazy and the boy that's girl crazy are both abnormal types, and if you only knew what a terrible amount of misery, crime and wretchedness these two types cause themselves and society when their wild emotions carry them into paths of danger, a lot of you beardless boys and half-fledged broilers would put the brakes down hard before it is too late. Kiss and bliss are synonymous. Old Dame Nature attended to that, for if there had been no kisses there would have been no misses, and without sex attraction only the animals would occupy this world. If young ladies, however, make their lips a slobbering board for every man that comes along, and do not keep those lips chaste, clean and pure for the one man who will regard them as the shrine of his heart's desire and who for life will stand guard over those ruby portals, then we shall all become akin to the animals and the world will be nothing but a jungle. We have been drifting in that direction for the last few years at a terrible pace and it is time someone called a halt. Ask the gentleman to produce an engagement ring before he kisses you the next time. It seems to me that he cannot hold you in very high regard or he would at least go home, clean up and put on his Sunday best when he calls on you. If the poor man is suffering from the high cost of clothes and can't afford anything but overalls and a flannel shirt that's all cotton, we'll pass the hat to get him a suit and will throw in the hat as well. I suppose a professional swimmer is the only gentleman who would be prohibited from calling on his heart's adored in his working clothes. Whether or not he loves you I don't know, but if he does not think enough of you to doll up and make a decent, clean, wholesome appearance, I don't think he respects you, or at least he thinks you are easy and holds you cheap. Love without respect is not love but something to be ignored and abhorred. Keep away from it.

EGGLESTON, W. VA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Uncle, I have always loved you from the depths of my heart and am tickled to bits with the way you roast our enemies within and without. I'm glad you didn't go to France. We had plenty of men that could shoot and use a bayonet but no other could use a pen as you have done. You put over a barrage and went over the top here in America as well as the best of us ever did in France. It was just as necessary to fight our enemies in the rear as in the front and you were the one who knew how to do it and who did it. I was on the front almost two months without a rest and in the thickest fighting at Dead Man's Hill and Montfaucon and through the Argonne Forest and across the Meuse River on Nov. 10, and heard the last shots fired at 11 o'clock on Nov. 11, the day the armistice was signed. Was in the 80th Division heavy field artillery. Am 27 years of age, still single, love fun and sport, teach in our Sunday school and received a diploma three years ago. Have traveled over most of France and a small part of Belgium. Much love to you and all the cousins.

EDWARD H. LAWSON.

Thank you, Edward, for your lovely and most complimentary letter. Glad you appreciate the work I have tried to do in fighting Huns, slackers, whining pacifists, crack-brained dreamers, treacherous aliens who camouflage as socialists but were Kaiser cuddlers to a man, and all the verminous hordes who feed on the life-blood of a nation, call for protection when in trouble, assume all the rights of citizenship, but refuse to bear any of its responsibilities. It has been a hard and terrible fight for me this last five years and it has sapped what little strength I had and left me pretty much of a wreck, but as long as I can wield a pen I shall do my best to keep the fires of patriotism burning and prevent our people so far as possible from being infected with the universal madness which seems to have seized the world and which, if we are not careful, will make vain all the sacrifices of blood and treasure offered up in this great world war, and enable the Hun to get on top again. There are racial groups among us, who are frantically striving to arouse hate and drive a wedge between us and our Allies. The hyphenated hordes who are attempting to put this job over never become truly Americanized and if at any time they shed their blood for America it is only because they expect later on to own and control it for the benefit of subtle foreign interests which dominate them, and which will dominate all of us if we don't watch out. Here is a symptom of the disease, which I gather from the New York Times of Oct. 16, 1919, and which will, if persisted in, eat out the heart of this nation: "William R. Hearst in that Borough (Brooklyn) has endorsed Major Michael A. Kelly * * * now a candidate of the so-called Liberty Party for president of the Board of Aldermen. Major Kelly is making his appeal chiefly to the Irish element among the voters and to voters of German and Austrian extraction." If we are ever to have a country that is not a grade higher than that which we find in a monkey and parrot cage where national elements are ever at war with other national elements, every man who runs for office should be immediately thrown into the discard if he appeals to his constituents on any other grounds than that of pure Americanism. As we have a million and a half foreign born residents in this city, you can see the menace that lies in these racial appeals. I hoped the cement of patriotism would, as a result of our late struggle for existence, bind us all together in one indissoluble whole. But, alas, it seems it is not to be, unless splendid boys of your type, Ed., set your foot down hard, keep men out of office who are tainted with the least suspicion of pandering to the undigested alien groups who are such a menace to our existence, all of whom have axes to grind and not one of which, as a rule, is to be used for a strictly American purpose. If a man can't get into office without riding in on a Sinn Fein, Hun or Austro-Hun back, then for heaven's sake keep him out.

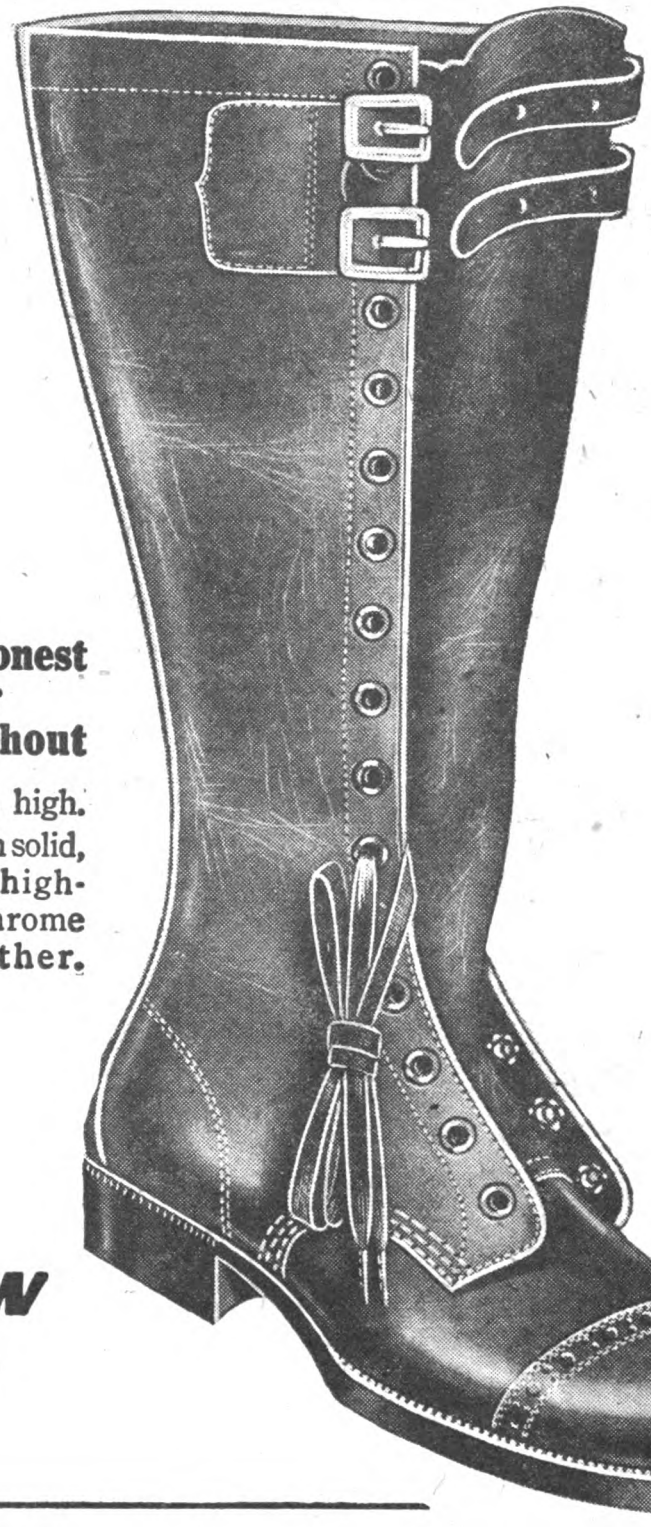
ADON, WYO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Few people live in this part of the country. There are large ranches and some small farms or homesteads as we call them. My family owns about 2,300 acres of land. We live in the hills close to some small mountains. Am fourteen years old, have brown hair and blue eyes, five feet four inches tall, weigh one hundred pounds. This is a healthy place to live. In the five years we have been here I have only been in bed twice and that was when we had influenza. Our nearest town, Gilette, is twenty miles away. We have a small schoolhouse and eleven scholars. I'm the only girl around here for fifteen miles. All of the other sex that I see are cowboys. There is a big ranch, close to here where they have twenty thousand head of cattle and some horses. My sister and I do all the riding. You ought to see the vast numbers of longhorn white-faced cattle that roam the hills and plains out here. There has never been a death in our family, which consists of seven girls, three boys and our parents. People who love excitement and gaiety don't like it out here, though the people are the jolliest and best natured I have ever met, and why shouldn't they be, their money comes and goes easy. It is dry out here but my father and some others irrigate.

Your niece, CHLOE JACKSON.

Chloe, yours is a delightfully interesting letter. I know well all the country around where you live, and when my weary brain cries out for something inspiring and refreshing, I think often of the Teton Mountains, like cathedral spires towering into the heavens. Glorious Teddy Roosevelt, God rest his soul, knew the joy of living in a country like yours, and so do I, but idiotic, crazy people prefer a miserable existence in the dirty city slums to a real life among the plains and the mountains. Healthy as Adon is, I would strongly suggest, Chloe, that you take a little more rest than you are getting. A young lady who has only been in bed twice in five years will surely ruin her health if she does not watch out. Something is radically wrong when a young lady only goes to bed twice in five years. Is the trouble with you or the bed? Now you see with me it is the other way about, I've only been out of bed twice in twenty-three years. I can't stand up, and from your letter it would seem that you can't lie down. It is a sad state of affairs for both of us and I don't know which is in the worst fix. You say your sister and you do all the riding. From that I infer that the cowboys have to walk. That is pretty tough on the cowboys. A cowboy without a horse is almost as bad as a saloon without booze. You say that it is dry out in your vicinity but that your father and some others irrigate. Irrigation ceased on July the first, so I guess it will be a case of the old oaken bucket and the water wagon from now on for those who live in the U. S. A. Once, more, Chloe, thank you for your most interesting letter.



WOODLAWN, R. R. 1, ILL.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am writing a few lines to greet you on your birthday. My mother has taken COMFORT for a good many years and I want to tell you that your page is the first I turn to, for I love you from the depths of my heart and soul for your fearlessness and unselfishness, in the talks that you give for the good of all humanity. If people would only pay heed to your warnings what a better world this would be to live in, and when I read a letter that you put in from anyone that insults you it makes my blood boil to think what little sense they show. Well, dear Uncle, I certainly hope and pray that God will spare your life until the great world struggle is ended and peace is restored at last, for, as you say in your September issue, the whole world is sick. It is a hard proposition getting people to think right. I was telling myself a year ago that if Uncle Charlie were here for another birthday I would write and let him know how I for one appreciate and love him.

Yours truly, MRS. A. KELLEY.

Comfort's League of Cousins

Thank you, Mrs. Kelley, for your note which reached me on my birthday and touched me deeply, as did hundreds of others that came to me on that momentous occasion. Just when I feel that life is not worth the living, that humanity in the mass is not worth fighting for, that it is sordid, horrid, ugly, brutal, greedy, vile and contemptible, then along comes a letter like yours, and my heart and soul are refreshed and I know that there is a little leaven of love, goodness, purity and sweetness that will in God's good time leaven the whole lump of wiggling, squirming, fighting, snarling, biting, inhuman beans, and make them decent members of society. But you can't bank on anything just now, for the late war was the biggest upset the world has ever known, and though God was with us and saw that right triumphed over might, I should not wonder if in view of what has happened since the armistice was signed, that He had turned His face from the world in disgust. With a sick world we could deal, but the sickness the world is suffering from today, is a thousand times more dangerous than the flu or any other epidemic we ever had, for today the world is one big bughouse of clawing, grabbing, bloodthirsty lunatics, madmen, schemers and agitators. To deal with a condition of this kind is far more perilous than fighting Kaiserism. Kaiserism, like a skin disease merely afflicted us from without. The madness that is now raging is of a different type and is rending us within, tearing at our very vitals. If we could take these millions of madmen, put them in straitjackets, give them sixty grains of bromide, tie a chunk of ice on their heads and send them into dreamland and keep them asleep until war hysteria and the mania of greed, hate and lust for power had worn off, then we'd have a dear old peaceful world once more. A free press and free speech are the fundamentals of liberty and are guaranteed by our constitution, but the best government and the finest institutions in the world can never stand up against a lot of dirty, filthy, contemptible sheets that turn decent citizens into Bolsheviks and madmen by the tens of thousands daily. Thousands of greasy, fiendish rascals are standing on their soap boxes, from which they carefully remove the soap (an article they never use), inflaming the passions of the credulous and filling the minds of honest, decent workers with ideas which will mean the destruction of everything humanity has tried to build from the time when men lived in caves and trees tens of centuries ago. They are determined to tear our government and institutions to pieces, bring about a bloody revolution, fill our land with plague, famine and disease, lust and devilishness and convert it into a shambles. I know what honest agitation is for I have been an agitator and a soap boxer myself, but the ideas and ideals which I and those who associated with me advocated, Christ Himself could have endorsed, and they would never have harmed the hair of even a Rockefeller's head. The ideas, however, that are being spread abroad today are those that will bring death and starvation to the decent, honest, God-fearing people of our land and put all of us who are not insane under the domination of hordes of thugs, criminals and hoodlums. Burn these reptile sheets, send the agitators to Russia or to jail. Hang a few of the worst of these vermin and let Ole Hanson do the job, for he seems to be the only man in the country who has a backbone, and we will have peace. Once more, Mrs. Kelley, I thank you, and if Mr. Kelley has no objections, I'm returning the love you sent me with interest.

GRAND JUNCTION, R. R. 1, MICH.

A GIRL'S LAMENT.

Although I am a woman, for housework I don't care,
I hate to wash the dishes, but I'd love to kill a bear.
I'd love to sally forth and hunt the jungle through
For lions, tigers, bears and things, but I'd hate to make beef stew.

I envy boys their freedom to go sailing o'er the sea,
If I could travel o'er the deep, I'd shout and sing with glee.
But girls must sew and mend and bake, and hunt for brother's things,
For "Sister" every time is blamed when hammer and fish hooks take wings.

But when the bill collector comes and says a payment's due,
I'm reconciled to wearing skirts when father looks so blue.

GRACE KNIGHT.

Grace, you are both a poet and a philosopher and you have a keen sense of humor. That is what the Kaiser and the German people lack, and that is what makes them so dangerous. If the Kaiser had had as keen a sense of humor as you have, he would have seen what a lot of rot all this military goose stepping was and there would have been no war. I don't, however, approve of your desire to go out and in the name of sport kill everything that comes in your path. You don't love to wash dishes, and for that matter few people do, and I suggest that instead of going out and killing a bear, you go out and kill the man who invented dishes. He has made more trouble for housewives and their daughters than any man since the beginning of time. You say you hate to make beef stew, why not make kidney stew instead—that may come easier. You say if you could travel o'er the deep, you would shout and sing with glee. Now as a matter of fact you would be the sickest girl on earth and you'd be either leaning over the rail feeding the fishes or lying in your bunk yelling for the steward to bring you the basin. If you don't like sewing and mending, I advise you to join a clotheless tribe of unclad Africans in the heart of the Dark Continent. But even there you could not escape the cooking infliction, for in that nice, hot, thousand-degrees-in-the-shade climate you'd bake all right. If brother has been to France and in the trenches, he has doubtless had to do so much hunting for cooties that he is by now a professional hunter, and when the hammers and fish-hooks become aviators and take wings and fly, you won't be called on to do the sky pilot act and chase after them. I'm glad you realize that papas, who are generally regarded as a necessary evil, tolerated only because there is no legal way to dispose of them, are handy pieces of domestic furniture to have around when the bills have to be paid. In these days of high prices I don't wonder that papa looks blue when he is paying the bills, but if father's color scheme does not appeal to you on these painful occasions, you can easily remedy it by daubing him all over with a de Valera Sinn Fein coat of Irish green. If you do that you will always have a greenback in the house and papa can't go broke. Once more, Grace, thank you for your very clever little "pome."

AVERY, IOWA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I notice you are very severe on the Bolsheviks in Russia, and I write to set you straight on them. There is no use to go to extremes, and, give the devil his due, the Bolshevik is certainly making a thorough-going revolution in Russia. I'm afraid if you had lived during the time of the French Revolution, you would have railed against it just as much as you do now against the Russian revolution, but it is conceded that the French Revolution was a good thing for Europe. You have to have a thorough-going revolution in order to make any effective change in a country and Russia needs it now as France did, and you can't have revolutions that will amount to anything unless there is more or less bloodshed. You get changes and the poor have a chance to come into their own and perhaps get a piece of land as it is impossible now. The radical socialists in this country won't be happy until they have tried out their theories in practice. Have Uncle Sam set some large tracts of land aside and induce a lot of the most radical to settle on it and try themselves out. Let him furnish him with some means to carry out their theories in practice. I believe it would be better than to jail them as you advocate.

—AXEL PETERSON.

Axel, a little knowledge and superficial thinking are dangerous things. Sorry, but you are afflicted with both. You say "there is no use to go to extremes," and then you contradict yourself by saying "you can't have revolutions that will amount to anything without bloodshed." If that's the case, suppose we start the bloodshed on you. That would knock some of the red rubbish out of your head. I note you publish a little sheet called "The Avery Boomer," and that you are boosting capitalist enterprises, so that puts you in the bourgeois or middle class which the Bolsheviki intend to wipe out. Axel, you are doomed and I will write your epitaph: "Here lies a chump who was killed by his own theories." There was no need to go to extremes in Russia. Russia had a free hand and all the world wished her well. She had only to finish her work of helping the Allies to lick the Central Powers, and then if she had wanted a republic or even a liberal constitutional monarchy (which is about all she can handle for a generation, for what she needs is soapiets and not soviets), the world would have watched her experiment with interest and have rendered every assistance. But she preferred the poison of Lenine and Trotzky and spurned the reason of Kerensky. Like curs, the Russians turned their backs on their friends while the red fiends dispersed the Constituent Assembly which the people had elected, and started a reign of terror. The poison of the German agents, Lenine and Trotzky, did its work. The soldiers deserted the firing line and rushed home to rob and plunder not only the big estates which would in time have been divided up, but to rob and kill their more propsperous neighbors. Then the dictators let the German hordes in and stole every dollar they could get

All Styles of

Geneva Phonographs

Play ALL Makes of Disc Records

Without change of parts, Geneva Phonographs play all makes and sizes of disc records. The possession of a Geneva not only permits you to enjoy all phonograph music, but it reproduces the different records in a wonderful manner, due to the large size sound chambers and perfect sound-box and tone arms. But a Geneva is more than a phonograph—it is a beautiful article of furniture at the same time. Several different models, in handsome designs, oak and dark shade of mahogany finish. Cabinets contain larger shelves, giving plenty of space for holding records. Equipped with all steel, double spring motors, tone modifiers, speed regulator, and all exposed metal parts highly finished. You'll be glad to own a Geneva. You'll enjoy it day after day. You'll regard it as the best investment for your home and family that you ever made. But prices of phonographs are mounting higher and higher. The demand is twice as large as the supply. We are the sole distributors of Genevas. We have no selling agencies—no travelers—no salesmen. We sell only direct to the home. We are able to take care of orders promptly NOW—so arrange for your Geneva on trial NOW, before we, also, are obliged to raise prices because of increasing cost of both labor and material.

"USED WHILE YOU SLEEP"

The Inhalation Treatment for Whooping-Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Colds, Catarrh, Asthma, Influenza, Coughs, Bronchitis.

Simple, safe and effective, avoiding internal drugs.

Vaporized Cresolene relieves the paroxysms of Whooping-Cough and Spasmodic Croup at once; it nips the common cold before it has a chance of developing into something worse, and experience shows that a neglected cold is a dangerous cold.

Mrs. Ballington Booth says: "No family, where there are young children, should be without this lamp."

The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inhaled with every breath, makes breathing easy and relieves the congestion, assuring restful nights.

It is called a boon by Asthma sufferers.

Cresolene relieves the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles, and is a valuable aid in the treatment of Diphtheria.

It is a protection to those exposed.

Cresolene's best recommendation is its 40 years of successful use.

Sold by Druggists. Send for descriptive booklet 24.

Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated Throat, composed of slippery elm bark, licorice, sugar and Cresolene. They can't harm you. Of your druggist or from us, 10c. in stamps.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

Mrs. Parlette.—A letter such as yours should put to shame the sisters and brothers who are more able, physically and financially, to help Uncle Charlie than you and your afflicted husband are. He will appreciate your generous donation all the more because of the spirit in which it is made.—Ed.

MASS, MICH.

TAP! TAP! TAP!

Dare I hope I heard "Come in?" I knocked very timidly because I tried once before and was denied admittance but try again is my motto.

God bless you, Verne Ellis, for once more taking up Uncle Charlie's Home Fund for discussion and reminding us of our duty to him whom we, as one, profess to love and admire. Sisters, wake up! How do you know that tomorrow will be just as good a day to send your money? Do it now. Just think, we were able to buy Liberty Bonds and War Saving Stamps and there was no great difficulty about it but because this calls for a dime or a little more (dollars if you can spare them), we allow it to go on, thinking one dime won't be missed or won't swell the fund any. Now sisters, and brothers, suppose we had thought that our Liberty Bond or Thrift Stamp wasn't going to win the war? Where would we be now? I'd tell you if you didn't know but every COMFORT reader knows. Uncle Charlie has done his best that we should know.

Really I don't believe there is another paper published that is so indispensable to its readers as COMFORT is and it is always growing. What I like about it is that the sisters are all God-fearing, God-loving women, which is not so common in this chaotic age.

Young Wife, in October issue, your experience is much like mine. Would you mind writing to me? I also was married when very young, at sixteen, and married my first love. I was only fourteen when we first met. We've been married now over seven years and we are still lovers. Of course there have been sunshine and showers—even storms, but the sunshine is always brighter after a shower. We have two of the dearest children, Anna Melbra Lauraine, aged four, and Raymond Leslie, aged six months.

Once more I plead, don't forget the fund. Isn't it rather a shame to have the men folks remind us of our duty as we started out with so much enthusiasm? Let's finish with the same spirit! Forward, march! to that little hoard, wherever we all happen to store it and then what a happy New Year we can make.

Love to all. MRS. SENIA HILL.

SIDNEY, BOX 564, NEBR.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

A few days ago I read J. Fred Macdonald's letter in COMFORT and now, before I forget it, I am going to write my third letter to the Sisters' Corner and also send $1.00 to Uncle Charlie's Home Fund. I had been wondering what ever happened to it. If any one thinks more of Uncle Charlie than I do, show me.

I am a widow with not so much of this world's goods; five acres across the street from the city limits and an old hen coop, but it is Home Sweet Home. I am taking care of my mother. She will be 83 if she lives until June 27, 1920, so I have not much of a chance to earn money as she has been in bed nearly three years and I don't do much else but take care of her.

I'll tell you how I earned the money for Uncle Charlie. I sold house plants. I have very good luck with flowers.

I don't see why we can't get together and get the money for a home for him. It would be much better than a monument after he is gone. I'd rather have the flowers while I'm living. When I'm dead I won't know anything about it.

I have taken COMFORT fifteen years and expect to take it as long as I live. My subscription is now paid until January, 1922.

I would like to correspond with someone from Oregon, southern Colorado or California.

I will close my letter with a description of myself. Five feet, four inches tall, 43 years young, grey-blue eyes, golden hair and weigh 170 pounds.

Best wishes to all. H. B.

LEBANON, PA.

DEAR COMFORT FRIENDS:

After reading the letters of Verne Ellis and J. Fred Macdonald I can keep quiet no longer and must join the boosters for Uncle Charlie's Home Fund. Just think of writing some of our rich men asking help for Uncle Charlie when if each one of the COMFORT readers would give their bit he would have that home for which his heart yearns and have it through the efforts of friends who love him and appreciate the good work he is doing. Must we delay till too late? Let us do our bit now while Uncle Charlie is with us. A home will bring him happiness and enable him to get the rest he so sadly needs, while a tombstone, no matter how grand, after he is at rest, will be of no use at all.

Come on, true friends of Uncle Charlie, and make the Home Fund increase to such an extent within the next few weeks that the first of the year will see him in a home of his own.

Sincerely yours, MRS. J. S. NAGLE.

LINCOLNTON, N. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I've been thinking for a long time that I would write but put it off from time to time. In a recent issue I saw something about Uncle Charlie's Home Fund and that the money can be sent to you. I am sending $1.00 and truly hope others will send the same amount, or more. I earned mine picking cotton and this being my first year in the cotton patch it took me an evening to pick thirty-five pounds; at a cent a pound it took several evenings to earn one dollar. I am sure all can earn it some way and we enjoy giving when we earn what we give. Let us all pray that by Easter, 1920, enough will be sent for Uncle Charlie's home.

I read the sisters' letters and husband reads the others to the children. The print is so fine. We had an automobile accident in 1918 and my eyes are still affected from the nervous shock. I was unconscious a week and after that for a while I saw double.

I should be glad to have a letter shower on my birthday which will be January 11. Before my marriage my name was Hagar Hunt. Should any of my old schoolmates see this, I hope to hear from them.

With love to Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters,

MRS. R. E. YODER.

ONTARIO, ORE.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have just read the letters in the Sisters' Corner, signed Verne Ellis and Fred McDonald. I am with them in boosting for Uncle Charlie's Home Fund. Let's give him a home while he is alive to appreciate it; not wait until he is dead and then praise his good works and deeds. He does not work for fame but for the good of humanity, although deeply afflicted himself. You who have subscribed for the Roosevelt Memorial, subscribe one tenth of the amount to Uncle Charlie's Home. Roosevelt has passed away and what you give toward his memory will do him no good but Uncle Charlie needs a home while he lives. I am an old subscriber, seventy years old, and have not much of this world's goods but am sending my mite.

A SUBSCRIBER.

PINETOP, ARIZ.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been a reader of COMFORT all my life. I see Verne Ellis and J. Fred McDonald are boosting Uncle Charlie's Home Fund Again. If all the readers of COMFORT would send ten cents he could buy a home for himself. I believe he has earned it and there are many who could give him from one to five dollars and not miss it. Just think, we are getting $500.00 worth of literature for only 50 cents a year so surely we can donate a few dollars to the fund. Come on, let's not be pikers. Let's donate enough by January first to buy him a good home. I am enclosing money order for $1.00.

With best wishes to Uncle Charlie and all the COMFORT readers, JOHN W. ADAIR.

SWISSVALE, PA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT READERS:

Will you allow me a little room in your corner? I have read COMFORT for years and have enjoyed the Sisters' Corner as well as the rest of the dear old paper.

I, like Verne Ellis, wonder why we cannot go over the top with Uncle Charlie's Home Fund, that was so well started but never finished. I, for one, think we are all real slackers for not finishing this worthy undertaking. Uncle Charlie has done and is doing more for the betterment of mankind than any other one man living, I believe.

Let's get together in a hurry and finish this before the new year. There is hardly a reader of COMFORT who is not able to give something. We, who profess to love and admire him, should be ashamed for ever allowing this to lag as we have done. You could not give to a more worthy cause and I am sure what little we give will not be anything compared with what he has done for us.

I am enclosing my mite and hope and pray this will be the cause of thousands of others helping to put Uncle Charlie's Home Fund over the top.

Best wishes to all, FRANK M. BRYANT.

Soliloquy

I declare, these letters from the readers of COMFORT do flatter me, and they are interesting.

There are two from Mrs. Sippi, one from Alabama, one from Georgia—by one of my own name—one from Illinois, two from Kansas and one even from this city of sacred walls; and I am told there are more on the way.

Fortunes Founded Through Luck

THOMAS ALVAH EDISON.

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THE boy life of Edison, the "Wizard of Menlo Park," the greatest electrical discoverer of the age, was indeed a hard one. Born in the village of Milan, Ohio, his mother was responsible for the greater part of his schooling, for she herself taught him, and when he was only twelve years old he had to go to work and earn a living as newsboy on the Canadian Grand Trunk Railway, whose terminus was Detroit.

This was hard, disagreeable work, monotonous, too, and you may be sure he didn't get much time to sleep. But the boy Edison had an insatiable appetite for work—and for knowledge. Electricity attracted him, and in his spare moments he studied it, later adding chemistry, for he decided that the two went together.

THOMAS ALVAH EDISON.

Then came what was, perhaps, his biggest streak of luck—his being on the spot at the very instant a little chap was about to be crushed to death beneath a train. The boy Edison snatched the child from beneath the wheels, and in gratitude for saving his son's life, the father taught Edison telegraphy. During the day the boy sold papers on the train, his nights he devoted to study of the telegraph keys. He was fourteen then. When he was seventeen he was an expert telegrapher.

But for several years the germs of great inventions had been gathering in the boy's unusually keen and active mind. When, in 1862, the startling news came in of the Battle of Pittsburg Landing, the boy was greatly excited. He divined that fame and fortune awaited the man who could get such news to way-stations throughout the country in a few moments. But in those days, such a feat was impossible. Nevertheless, the boy determined to get the news of the battles over the wires, somehow. So he bought 1,500 copies of the newspaper, and induced operators to telegraph ahead that he was coming. As a result, great crowds were waiting at the various stations, and his papers went like hot cakes at fancy prices.

Then he started a paper of his own, the Grand Trunk Herald, which he edited and printed in a box-car loaned him by the railroad company. His newspaper went up in smoke, however, for an accident set the car afire.

After his luck in saving the child from certain death, which resulted in his becoming a telegraph operator, he worked in various places in this country and Canada as operator, largely increasing his practical knowledge of electricity.

Then began his long series of truly marvelous inventions, and he built first one electrical plant, then a larger one, finally the present laboratory at West Orange, N. J.

A few of Edison's inventions are the automatic repeater, quadruplex telegraph, printing telegraph, and, later on, the phonograph, incandescent lamp, kintescope, kintephone, etc. He has received patents for more than 900 inventions and, at 74, is still "going strong." He has won medals, been decorated by foreign governments, and many American colleges have conferred degrees upon him.

After his big stroke of luck when he was 14, what is the secret of Edison's success? Work!

At an age when many boys smoked cigarettes, wasted their spare time playing pool or the races, or in "shooting craps," the young Edison was putting in every second he could spare in studying electricity, telegraphy and chemistry.

He was equipping himself to wrest mighty secrets from Nature, and so become what he is today—the world's foremost inventor and one of mankind's greatest benefactors.

Saving a child's life was the luck that led to his fame and fortune.

Got 117 Eggs Instead of 3

That's what one subscriber wrote. Read below a few of thousands of letters.

Nothing Equals "More Eggs"
Dear Mr. Reefer: I don't think there is anything to equal your "More Eggs" Tonic. I am getting 8 eggs a day off 9 hens. Before I was getting one or two a day, and sometimes not any at all. That Egg Tonic is certainly doing great work. — Yours truly, MRS. WILLIAM DEER, Steele, North Dakota.

Wants Wonderful Offer on Reefer's "More Eggs"
Dear Mr. Reefer: The "More Eggs" Tonic that we got from you was all right. We were getting about 3 or 4 eggs a day when we got it, and now we average from 26 to 30 a day. I am enclosing money order for your wonderful offer.—From your friend, MINNIE HAWKINS, Cloversport, Ky.

27 Eggs Instead of 1
I began feeding "More Eggs" Tonic to my flock of hens in November. At that time I was getting one egg every other day. Then, on Dec. 5th, I brought in 27, which is very good for this time of the year. I think "More Eggs" Tonic is fine.—MRS. E. H. PALMER, Dundee, Mich.

1,368 Eggs After One Package
Last fall I bought a box of your "More Eggs" Tonic, and would like to have you know the result. From January 1st to July 1st my hens laid 1,368 eggs.

I have been using "More Eggs" Tonic for 3 or 4 weeks now. My egg production has been doubled.—J. C. KOENINGER, Paradise, Texas.

633 Eggs in 28 Days
Dear Mr. Reefer: I want to tell you what "More Eggs" Tonic has done for me. I had only been getting 6 or 8 eggs a day, and I have now reached 35. From 50 hens I got 633 eggs in 28 days. I never shall be without "More Eggs" Tonic, and sell it to my friends.—Yours sincerely, MRS. WM. De BERRY, Ridgeley, Tenn.

Comfort Readers Praise "More Eggs"

We wrote to about 2,000 Comfort Magazine subscribers asking what they thought of Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic. The most enthusiastic answers were received. All told of wonderful increases in egg production. The same chance is now given all other Comfort readers who raise chickens and who want to get more eggs and more money from their flocks. Surely, what "More Eggs" has done for others, it can do for you. Read below a few of the letters received by Mr. Reefer from among the of his great egg producing tonic. These are but a few of thousands of letters:

Surprise to Everyone — Neighbor Gets More Eggs
Dear Mr. Reefer: Three weeks ago I sold E. F. Schainer a package of your "More Eggs," and I saw him this morning. He told me he was very much surprised that he had only been getting 6 eggs a day and now he is getting 30. I, myself, am surprised. I was getting one or two eggs a day, and now I am getting 22. —Yours truly, CHARLES VARENHOHL, Greenville, Ill.

Here's Absolute Proof
Dear Mr. Reefer: I have been using "More Eggs" Tonic and think it is fine. I was getting only 5 or 6 eggs a day, and after a few weeks I got 25 or 30 a day.—Yours truly, J. R. WEATHERTON, Montana, Arkansas.

$200 Worth of Eggs from 44 Hens
I never used "More Eggs" Tonic until last December — then just used one $1 package, and have sold over $200 worth of eggs from 44 hens. "More Eggs" Tonic did it. — A. G. THODE, Sterling, Kas., R. No. 2, Box 47.

20 Times as Many Eggs
Dear Mr. Reefer: The $1.00 size of "More Eggs" Tonic you sent me was a success from the start. From one and two eggs a day from about 40 hens I have brought them up to 22 a day.—Yours very truly, LOUIS H. HILL, Lawtey, Fla.

Laying More Than Ever
E. J. Reefer: I had a box of Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic and I like it fine. I have 36 hens and they are laying more than they ever did; so please send me another order.—Yours truly, KATE T. TERRY, Dubois, Illinois.

Increase from 8 to 36 Eggs
I am well pleased with your "More Eggs" Tonic. I was only getting 8 or 9 eggs a day —now I am getting 3 dozen a day.—WM. SCHMIDT, Shady Bend, Kansas.

1,200 Eggs from 29 Hens
The "More Eggs" Tonic did wonders for me. I had 29 hens when I got the tonic and was getting five or six eggs a day. April 1st I had over 1,200 eggs. I never saw the equal.—EDW. MEKKER, Pontiac, Mich.

Gets Eggs in January
Dear Mr. Reefer: I began feeding my flock your "More Eggs" Tonic the 22d of January, and have fed it every day. I am now getting from 20 to 27 a day.—Yours truly, MRS. T. J. MITCHELL, Pocahontas, Arkansas.

36 Hens — 36 Eggs Daily
Dear Mr. Reefer: Enclosed you will find $5. Please send me your $5.00 offer of "More Eggs." I have 3 dozen hens, and I was not getting an egg when I began using your "More Eggs" Tonic. Now I am getting from 30 to 36 a day.—Yours truly, N. WARREN, Academy, Calif.

"More Eggs" Makes $300
I used "More Eggs" Tonic during the winter. I was able to sell $300 worth of eggs. Good record. — JOSEPHINE BEVARD, Derby Iowa.

75 Per Cent Laid Every Day
The "More Eggs" Tonic I ordered from you last winter proved out very satisfactory. Fully 75 per cent of my hens laid every day.—H. C. RADER, Greenville, Tenn.

"More Eggs" Puts Hens in Fine Condition
Dear Mr. Reefer: Your "More Eggs" Tonic is wonderful. I never saw such a change in poultry as your "More Eggs" makes. It is fine.—Yours respectfully, F. E. SCHAMP, Minnie, W. Va.

Finish Moult—Lay Quickly
E. J. Reefer: I used Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic, and I know it did my old hens good, for as soon as they got through moulting they began laying. Please rush me a supply.—Yrs. respectfully, E. C. McCALL, Williamsburg, Pa.

Alabama Praises "More Eggs"
Dear Mr. Reefer: I think "More Eggs" is the finest medicine I ever gave to my hens, and I will send you another order soon. — MRS. B. STEPHENS, Fulton, Ala.

160 Hens — 1,500 Eggs
I have fed two boxes of "More Eggs" to my hens, and I think they have broken the egg record. I have 160 White Leghorns, and in exactly 21 days I got 125 dozen eggs.—MRS. H. M. PATTON, Waverly, Missouri.

His Heart's Queen

the terms I have proposed?" he inquired, without deigning any reply to the vindictive retort.

His manner was so calm and self-contained that Wilhelm Mencke imagined that he was upon the point of yielding to his demands, rather than have the risk of having the jewelry pawned, and he replied, rather more rudely and emphatically than he might have done, perhaps, could he have foreseen how the interview was to terminate:

"Yes, sir, I do," a horrible oath completing the sentence.

Wallace very deliberately slipped the box into a drawer in his desk, locked it, and put the key in his pocket.

"Then, Mr. Mencke, a court of justice will have to decide to whom this property rightfully belongs, and what disposition shall be made of it," he said, with a quietness and self-possession which utterly confounded his companion.

CHAPTER XXV.

WILHELM MENCKE MAKES A STARTLING DISCOVERY.

"Wh—what do you mean, you—you—upstart!" Wilhelm Mencke finally exclaimed, starting to his feet, his face flushing to an almost purple hue with anger, his huge, fat fists threateningly uplifted.

He was an extremely repulsive-looking object in his impotent rage, and his blustering manner would have cowed and alarmed a less courageous man than Wallace.

"You had better sit down, Mr. Mencke, and compose yourself," he quietly remarked, but without so much as the flinching of an eyelid.

"Give me that box!" hissed the man, savagely, and shaking his fist in close proximity to Wallace's nose; yet his look shifted uneasily before the young man's calm gaze.

"I shall not give you the box, Mr. Mencke," he returned, without the slightest variation in his tranquil tone.

"I shall have you arrested for theft," blustered the irate man, but with not quite so much confidence as before.

"Sit down, sir," Wallace now sternly demanded; "I wish to talk with you further about this matter."

The man instinctively obeyed him and sank back into his chair, but with much muttering and grumbling about being "swindled out of his rights by a low-born beggar."

Wallace paid no attention to his abuse, but resumed, with inflexible decision and in a business-like way:

"Now, sir, I will make terms with you. The contents of that box belonged to my wife, Violet Huntington Richardson—almost every piece of the jewelry is marked with the initials of her maiden name, and there would be no difficulty whatever in having it identified. That she was my wife can be readily proved by a certain document which I have in my possession and which you have already seen. These two propositions being established, another can be deduced from them—namely, that the husband of Mrs. Richardson would have the first claim upon whatever personal property she might have possessed at the time of her death. Now, Mr. Mencke, if you wish to have me arrested for theft, you can at once institute proceedings against me, and we will have the matter decided in court."

Wilhelm Mencke had grown as white as it was possible for his beer-inflamed face to become during these remarks, for he saw the force of Wallace's reasoning and realized that he had made a grand mistake in refusing to accept the young man's offer to him, and a greater one in allowing the box of jewelry to go out of his hands.

But he could not curb his rage, and he broke forth again, furiously:

"You are a —— robber; you have my property and you have taken an unfair advantage of me; you cannot prove that those jewels belong to any one else——"

"I am not a robber, sir, while I can prove—and fortunately at this very moment—that those articles of jewelry once belonged to my wife, Violet," Wallace calmly answered, as, reaching out his hand, he touched an electric button beside his desk.

A musical ring from the adjoining room responded to the pressure, and the next moment a clerk opened the door to ascertain what was wanted.

"Albert, is Lord Cameron still in the office?" Wallace inquired.

"Yes, sir," was the respectful reply.

"Ask him to please step in here for a few moments."

The clerk disappeared while Wilhelm Mencke's face grew blank with chagrin and mortification. Chagrin—for the mention of Lord Cameron's name told him that Wallace could indeed prove his statements—mortification because he could not endure the thought of meeting the young earl in his present reduced circumstances.

Lord Cameron entered almost immediately and instantly recognized Wallace's visitor.

The two men had not parted in the most cordial way, for the meanness and treachery of the Menckes having been revealed, the Camerons had not hesitated to show their disapproval and that they no longer desired their acquaintance. Accordingly his lordship only bowed distantly and coldly, as he now addressed the man by name, and then turned to his friend to ascertain why he had been summoned.

"Cameron, Mr. Mencke has called upon me this morning to dispose of some articles that once belonged to Violet," Wallace began, as he unlocked the drawer in his desk, and drew forth the contested box, "and I simply wished to ask you in his presence to identify them."

"Certainly, if I can do so," Lord Cameron readily replied, but losing a trifle of his color at the mention of Violet.

"They are the jewels which she used to wear," Wallace continued, as he uncovered the box and passed it to his friend. "Will you tell me if there is anything there that you recognize?"

"Why, yes, I recognize almost everything there is here," his lordship returned. "These rings I have often seen her wear—all save this plain heavy band; the bracelet, one pair of which were my own gift to her; also this lace pin of violets with the diamond center. Why, of course there can be no doubt that they were hers," he added, as he turned them over with reverent hand, "for nearly everything is marked with her initials."

"As I remarked before, Mr. Mencke wishes to dispose of them; he has offered them to me for the sum of two thousand dollars," Wallace said, carefully returning them to the drawer of his desk as his friend passed them back to him.

"What!" exclaimed the young earl, with a frown and look of astonishment; "he wishes to sell them, and to you?"

"Yes, and he demands the sum that I have named, or he threatens—at least he did threaten—to pawn them."

An expression of disgust swept over Lord Cameron's fine face; then he exclaimed, indignantly:

"Why, Richardson, that is beastly! But he has no right to the things at all; Violet was your wife, and every article belongs by law to you."

"So I have told him, and so, I think, any judge would decree," said Wallace. "Still, I could not think of allowing them to be pawned, and, as I did not wish to take any advantage of Mr. Mencke, who says he is in need of money, I have offered to go with him to any reliable jeweler and give him whatever sum may be named as their value, besides fifty dollars for the sake of associations."

"It is more than he ought to ask or even expect, Wallace—it is a very generous offer," said his lordship.

"But he refuses to take it—he demands two thousand dollars or nothing. I could not stand such extortion as that, and so have taken possession of the box, with the determination to have the matter settled by law. He claimed that I could not prove to whom they had belonged, therefore I took the liberty to call you, in order to show him that it would be a very easy matter to do so," Wallace explained.

"You did perfectly right," Lord Cameron responded, heartily, "and I will willingly give my testimony in the presence of both judge and jury, if need be."

Wilhelm Mencke began to realize that he had made a serious blunder—that he had overreached himself in his exorbitant demands.

He had no wish to have the matter decided by law—he would not have it made public upon any account, for it would then get into the papers, and that would bring about the very denouement which he was so anxious to avoid—that of uniting the young husband and wife.

He was terribly disappointed to be thus baffled in his plans, but he saw that he could not help himself, and that it would be wise to make the best of a bad situation, and take what money he could get from Wallace.

"He claims that I am a thief, and says he will have me arrested," the young architect observed, with a slight smile.

"Let him—the sooner the better; and it would be the better way to decide the matter; you should not be obliged to pay for what rightly belongs to you," said Lord Cameron, with a contemptuous glance at the discomfited man.

"True, but I am willing to stand by my word," Wallace gravely replied, for he also shrank from any publicity of the matter, "and I will not withdraw the proposition I have already made. "How is it, sir,"—turning with a quick, business-like air to Mr. Mencke—"will you go with me to some jeweler and take what he states to be the value of these things?"

"I don't see how I am to help myself," the man sulkily returned; "you have obtained the advantage of me and I am forced to submit; but I'll be even with you yet."

Wallace's lip curled at the cowardly insinuation and threat, but he did not reply to them.

"Will you accompany us, Cameron, so that there will be no suspicion that there is anything wrong about the transaction?" he asked his friend.

Lord Cameron readily assented, and the three men went out together.

They proceeded directly to Tiffany's, where an expert in the establishment soon set a price upon Violet's pretty ornaments, whereupon Wallace paid out the sum, together with the bonus which he had promised, to Wilhelm Mencke.

"Now, sir," he said, in a low, stern tone, as the man took the money with a hang-dog air, "let this transaction conclude all relations between us. I trust that we shall never meet each other again."

He turned abruptly away and walked out of the store, with his friend, leaving the discomfited schemer inwardly raging over what he considered a paltry sum, and the failure of his plot to "bleed" Wallace copiously, and secretly vowing that the disappointing transaction should not conclude all relations between them.

"I reckon you'd willingly give me twenty times this amount, my high-headed beggar, for a little secret there is in my possession," he muttered, as he went his own way, "and I'll manage yet to make you shell out handsomely; you shall pay dearly for riding, rough-shod, over me as you have done today."

That same evening when Wallace was alone in his room—a pleasant, luxurious apartment in an up-town house—he again examined the contents of that precious box.

All day long, since the interview of the morning, he had been heavy-hearted, and he had longed to get away by himself, that he might give vent to the grief which he found so hard to control.

He spread out those voiceless yet expressive mementoes on the table before him, and now almost every article seemed to arouse memories so tender, and yet so bitter, that he was forced to abandon himself to their sway, and, bowing his head upon the glittering jewels, he sobbed as only a strong man can sob, when the barriers are broken away from a long pent-up sorrow.

He sat there for hours, giving way to a hopeless grief; then he gathered up his treasures, one by one, with reverent touch, pressing them to his lips, while great tears rolled over his wan cheeks, and replaced them in the box upon a layer of cotton, covering them with another, and shutting them from his sight.

"I believe I will never look at them again," he murmured, as he locked them away in his trunk. "It seems almost like looking into her grave, and I could not bear many seasons of grief like this."

The next day he purchased a beautiful casket of carved ebony, inlaid with pearl, having a golden key, and when he again returned to his room, he locked that other box within it, then burying it within the depths of his trunk, he attached the tiny key to his watch-chain, beside the little charm that Violet had given him so long ago, and felt almost as if he had just locked his dead away in her tomb.

While Wallace had been indulging his long-pent grief in the solitude of his luxurious chamber, Wilhelm Mencke was alternately smoking his pipe and drinking beer from a capacious pitcher, in his miserable and comfortless lodging, reading meanwhile from a Cincinnati paper, which he took regularly, in order to keep himself posted upon what was transpiring in the city where he had formerly lived.

He had come to feel quite reconciled to the sum that he had managed to secure from Wallace that morning, though his hatred of that young man did not diminish one iota, and he thought he could not better improve the evening than by drinking to his own health and continued prosperity.

To be sure, he had not secured the two thousand which he had intended to wring from the young architect; but the sum he had obtained was no mean one, and he was planning to invest it in a small beer saloon, and thus start business for himself again.

All through the evening this plan was floating through his brain, as he read his paper, which, somehow, did not prove as interesting as usual.

But suddenly his eye alighted upon an article which caused an ejaculation of astonishment to escape him, and straightway put every other thought to flight.

"What is this?" he cried, sitting erect, throwing aside his pipe, and rubbing his eyes, as if to clear them from a mist which seemed to obscure the sight.

Then he read the paragraph through again, his face expressing first incredulity, then wonder, and finally, as he comprehended it more clearly, intense delight.

"Aha!" he cried, bringing his huge fist down upon the table with a force that made the beer slop over the edge of the pitcher; "my lucky star must be in the ascendant again. There will be no need of keeping a fourth-rate beer-shop now. Just let me work my cards aright, and I can hold up my head among the proudest once more," he concluded, with an exultant chuckle.

The paragraph which had produced this sudden excess of joy in this usually stolid man, read as follows:

"A singular case of unclaimed property has

A Jolly Trading Party

By Leslie Gordon

Copyright, 1919, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

A "TRADING" or "Swap" party makes lots of fun for people of all ages. It is a good entertainment to be given at home, or it can be held at a church sociable or form a jolly informal diversion for the ladies' society to hold at the Grange Hall. If liked, a small admission can be asked and the money given to the church or to some charitable purpose. It makes an enjoyable entertainment for a New Year's Eve party.

If it is a private party held at a home, the invitations should request each guest to bring some article that he or she would like to trade off for something else and to wrap the parcel in such a way that its contents cannot be told at a glance. When the "Trading Party" is held on a semi-public occasion such as a church supper or anything like that, it is well to have the ladies who are getting up the affair provide a table of securely wrapped articles which can be sold to those who come to the affair unprovided with goods to barter. These things can be any little trifles that the ladies of the society can make themselves or beg from their friends, such as sachet bags, tiny button bags, iron holders, a few home-made candies in a box, a bunch of assorted vegetables tied up like a bouquet and put in a box, anything that will raise a laugh or make an acceptable little souvenir. These things should be sold for ten or fifteen cents each, but they must not be examined before purchasing. At a certain hour, usually when most of the company have assembled, a bell is rung and the trading begins. The object of the traders is to swap articles as many times as possible in the hour or hour and a half devoted to the business.

It is permissible to look at each article before trying to trade it off, but this must be done discreetly so that no one but the would-be trader will see what it is. Then it must be wrapped up again and swapped without telling what the parcel contains. And this trading is kept up until the bell rings as a sign that the exchange is closed and the business is over. Each trader can, if he likes, keep what he has after the first swap, but in this case he stands no chance of winning the prize that is given to the "best business man or woman," that is the one who has had the briskest trade.

Before the trading starts, every participant is given a piece of paper or a plain card wtih his or her name written across the top on which to "keep the "books" of the "business." This is a very simple operation and consists of making a record of all the different articles that pass through one's hands. The person who has swapped the largest number of articles during the time of trading gets the first prize. When the bell rings, each person keeps the article that is in his possession at that time. Occasionally something that has been the rounds gets known by its size and everyone fights shy of it. For while some of the things traded do not appeal, others are decidedly worth having and the uncertainty of just what you are going to get each time helps to make the trading interesting. At a very jolly party that I attended not long ago, a large bandbox that looked as if it might contain something really wonderful was obtained by me for a small bundle done up in pink tissue paper that held a tiny cretonne button bag. As I have all the bags I can possibly use and more besides, I was glad to swap it for the bandbox. But when I surreptitiously peeked in the box, imagine my disappointment to find it contained nothing but a large cabbage. I suppose that owing to the high cost of living I should have been delighted, for cabbages nowadays, when they are of good size, are by no means cheap, but unfortunately I do not like cabbage, and anyway I was boarding, so I hastened to dispose of it. But I found to my dismay that it had been the rounds and everybody seemed to know just what the box contained. So I went into the next room, removed the cabbage from the box and made a neat square package of it, stuffing the inside of the parcel with wads of paper so that it would not show by its shape what it was. Then I came back into the trading room again with an air of triumph and my cabbage quickly found its way into other hands, leaving me when the bell rang with the prettiest little sachet bag imaginable. For few people had noticed my absence and everyone supposed I was offering something entirely different.

In entertainments of this sort much of the fun depends on the state of mind of the participants. Two or three jolly people can make the trading go with a great deal of vim, especially if they are quick at repartee and clever at persuading would-be swappers that the parcels they are trying to swap contain wonderful bargains just suited to the one on whom they are trying to work them off, but offered for exchange because they "have something just like it at home" or because "the color does not harmonize with their best clothes," or some nonsense of the sort.

The first prize for the best trader can be a small account book because this could be used by either a man or a woman, or there could be two first prizes, one for a gentleman and one for a lady. The lady's prize could be a box of home-made candy on which was written, "Swap a piece or two for Thank you's from your friends." The man could have a penknife or a paper knife for which he must swap a penny with his hostess or the president of the society in accordance with the old superstition that it is unlucky to be given a knife unless you give something for it.

It is amusing to make the supper an affair of swapping also. To do this, all the food must be wrapped in parcels and piled on trays that are passed to each person and every one is requested to take two bundles. When these are opened there is usually a great mixup. One guest will find he has two packages of delicious chocolate cake, another has drawn nothing but sandwiches, etc., so a merry exchange begins until all have obtained a little of everything that has been served. The coffee or lemonade or whatever drink is decided upon had best be passed in the usual manner and if ice cream forms a part of the feast it should also be passed as it is too easily melted to stand the wear and tear of "swapping."

If preferred, this same idea can be given quite a literary flavor and made much more "high brow" by having each guest write on the top of his parcel a name of a book or poem or even a "movie play" which it illustrates. For instance, a burnt-out electric bulb encased in a dainty box could be called "The Light That Failed," a dill pickle wrapped so that no one could recognize it would represent that popular book, "Eat and Grow Thin." One of those five- or ten-cent whistles with a tiny balloon-shaped bag on one end that when blown gives a blood-curdling screech, could be appropriately labeled "The Call of the Wild," while three or four feathers pulled out of an old feather duster might be named after that wonderful new moving picture of Mary Pickford's, "Less Than the Dust." But the title should have "er" added in small letters after it, to make it fit the duster. These things should be placed on a table at first and the guests invited to guess the contents on all others but their own bundles. The first to guess the contents correctly gets the article. The hostess should take charge of the table and as every one hands in his or her bundle he or she whispers what it contains. The hostess immediately puts this down on a list which she keeps for herself and shows to nobody. She numbers each box in pencil as she receives it and places the same number on her list opposite the name of the article it contains. In this way she can tell instantly whether or not the guesses are correct. After the boxes have been awarded to the people who are lucky or clever enough to guess by their titles just what they contain, they can be swapped. Sometimes two or three are offered for one. The person who gets the greatest number of articles either by guessing or swapping receives a prize. This is usually a book. This last variation of the Trading Party is best suited to a small informal entertainment given in the home.

Two Wonderful Foods

length strips of macaroni in boiling salted water and cook until soft. Drain, plunge into cold water and drain again. Arrange in four nests as illustrated. Take one half of a large-sized boiled beet and scoop out the center, and use as a foundation for the snow man which is shaped from hot well-seasoned mashed potato. Place in center of nests of macaroni and set into hot oven until all is hot enough to serve. Garnish with bits of parsley or other green, and for eyes, nose and mouth of snow man use pieces of the red beet.

COMBINATION DISH.—Boil tripe twenty minutes; dry and cut into inch pieces. Put into sauce-pan with a little butter, pepper and salt and lightly brown, stirring constantly. Boil small-sized onions, drain thoroughly and set into oven to keep hot. Make a sauce by putting two tablespoons of butter into a sauce-pan and when it bubbles smooth in two tablespoons of flour. Add slowly to this one pint of hot rich milk and cook three minutes. On a hot platter arrange the boiled onions and tripe and over it pour the hot sauce. Around the edge of platter arrange three-cornered slices of toast well browned and buttered. This is an excellent one-dish meal.

MARSHMALLOW CAKES.—One cup of molasses, one scant tablespoon of ginger, one half teaspoon of salt, and one teaspoon of soda mixed thoroughly together. Add one third cup of softened butter and beat again. Add alternately one cup of milk with three even cups of sifted pastry flour and beat hard. Bake twenty-five minutes in a moderate oven.

Boil together without stirring one cup of granulated sugar and one third cup of boiling water until it threads when a little is poured from a spoon. Pour in a fine stream into the well-beaten white of one egg and a scant quarter of a teaspoon of cream of tartar, beating continuously. Into this put six marshmallows cut in fine pieces and as soon as all is blended pour in mounds on the ginger cakes.

Driven Apart

I must take her away to some place where she can have medical attention."

"You can't have the car, see!" returned the surly voice of Gorsline. "It belongs to a cove as jest went in the house, and I'm keepin' it for him."

"I will have it! It is a matter of life and death!"

There was a rush, a quick and cruel impact of blows, and the man who was doing his utmost for the woman who was dear to him was stricken in a senseless heap to the pavement. Berdyne had heard the altercation, and was close at hand when Gorsline used his merciless fists.

"It's an earthquake," cried Gorsline, turning his evil gaze upon Berdyne, "the biggest 'Frisco ever had! The town is wrecked!"

"It came at a good time for me!" exulted the villainous Berdyne. "Where's the taxi?"

"The chauffeur hiked away like he was shot when the shake commenced."

"Where's Trenwyck?"

"He was scared out of his wits, and ran as if the fiend was after him."

Berdyne cursed under his breath.

"Well," he added, "get into the car and help me. We must get out of this and make for Sausalito."

"Not I—not on your life! The pickin' will be too good."

The ghoulish spirit had already taken hold of the depraved soul of Dave Gorsline. Berdyne laid Beryl on the front seat of the automobile, then reached for his revolver with the intention of driving Gorsline into the car at its point—but the weapon had been lost. Abandoning the hope of taking Gorsline with him, Berdyne jumped into the car; and, as he switched on the power, a look behind showed his accomplice leaning over the prostrate form on the walk, rifling it of valuables.

The street was fissured and gashed, and in places rendered almost impassible by heaps of debris. Berdyne was eager for speed, but could only pick his way along at a snail's pace. Again and again he was all but stopped by frenzied men and women, clad in their nightclothes, or such articles as they could catch up in their hurried flight, beseeching him to take them in and carry them to some point of safety. Every request of this kind he refused with brutal oaths.

At the first cross street he turned south, with the vague idea of gaining Market Street and the ferry. He had a chartered yacht riding in the waters off Sausalito, but the comprehensiveness of the disaster to the city, which impressed him more and more as he proceeded, filled him with despair of ever reaching the boat. If he could get across the bay to Oakland, or to Alameda, or to Berkeley, he felt that his crafty brain could find ways and means for keeping his lovely prisoner safe.

Suddenly, from somewhere, a policeman darted in front of the car. "Stop!" he called, raising his club.

"What do you want?" demanded Berdyne, leaning forward and peering with determined eyes into the officer's face.

"I want that automobile," was the sharp rejoinder. "Every car is being impressed to take prisoners from the Hall of Justice to the Presidio, where they can be guarded by the military. Get out quickly; I must have the machine."

"I am taking my wife to the hospital," shouted Berdyne, "and neither you, nor all the officers in the city, can take this car from me."

The officer saw the pallid, beautiful face of Beryl lying unconscious against the back of the cushioned seat. Whatever sentiment lurked in his heart will never be known, but he stepped aside and permitted the vehicle to pass.

"The Mechanics' Pavilion is to be turned into a hospital," said he, "and perhaps you had better go there. Most of the city is in ruins."

With a low, crafty laugh, Berdyne turned on the speed and sent the car ahead.

"Luck is with me this day," he gloated: "Preston is dead, and the beautiful Beryl Grayson is in my power! On, on to Oakland or Alameda or the Berkeley Hills! There we shall find refuge, and there my love shall finally win the day."

Another automobile loaded with men, women and children swept by him.

"Where are you going?" some one yelled to him.

"To the ferry!" he answered back.

"Useless!" came the cry. "The boats are not running! Fires are starting everywhere, and the water mains are bursted! If you would save yourself, take the San Bruno Road and go south!"

The other car dashed on through the tumult and clamor that came from all sides and swept over the fated city like a requiem for the lost.

Dismay gripped its strangling fingers about Berdyne's throat. He had first set his heart on Sausalito; then on the Berkeley Hills; now he was thinking of the houseboat in Belvedere Cove. Would it be possible to reach the water front and hire a launch?

Unlike most in that dazed and stupefied throng of refugees, Berdyne had plenty of ready money in his pockets. Money would secure a boat; money would do anything! He turned into another street and started eastward, toward San Francisco Bay and the wharves.

Abruptly he heard a cry, and became sensible of a movement beside him. He looked, and there sat Beryl, erect, conscious, with a blank, bewildered look in her great violet eyes. Through all that had passed since leaving the minister's she had been as one dead; now her senses were struggling to shake off the numbing effects of what had gone before, and to realize where she was and what had been happening.

Fitting links into the dread chain of events was a slow and almost fruitless task. She was like one stricken. But the handsome, leering face of Berdyne, gloating over her as she sat beside him, struck terror to her soul and brought her realization, in part.

She sought to leap from the car, but one of his heavy hands stayed her. She fought for release like a madwoman, but was like a child in his grasp.

"Help, help!" she screamed.

Strange that among all that clamor of distress her one, small voice should find ears. Yet so it chanced. A strong man, his face calm in the midst of all that excitement, hastened toward the car. Berdyne would have given added speed to the machine, had not a heap of bricks barred his way and compelled him to turn toward the approaching stranger in order to get around the barrier.

"What's the matter there?" demanded the man aggressively.

"My poor wife;" cried Berdyne, in seeming anguish. "Her ordeal has turned her brain. I am seeking to convey her to some place where we can find refuge."

"I am not his wife!" screamed poor Beryl. "He is a monster, a fiend! Oh, save me, save me!"

She stretched out her little hands toward the man, but he shook his head sadly and drew back, impressed by Berdyne's assumed air and superb acting.

"It is sad," said the man, "but only one case among thousands. Make for the crest of Telegraph Hill, my friend; I think you and your poor wife will be safer there than anywhere else."

Berdyne thanked him, rounded the heap of bricks, and glided away.

Sick and despairing, Beryl could only continue her struggles. She was pitting her feeble strength against the physical powers and crafty brain of a fiend. Her soul sickened within her. She begged, she implored, she threatened, but her only answer was a mocking laugh.

"I am Mrs. Preston!" she cried, in her desperation. "You will be called to sore account for this, Nicholas Berdyne!"

"I do not believe it," he said tauntingly. "Yet, even so, you are Neil Preston's widow. Did you not see him struck down before you? You are mine, my ravishing little beauty! The earthquake has given you to me; and I shall keep you in spite of fate—in spite of Heaven itself!"

The mockery of the words must have drawn down the wrath of the powers above. At that instant some one—some one with the mercy to think of others in that fearful time—called out:

"The live wires! Look out for the live wires!"

But it was too late. A tangling wire struck against the front of the automobile, hissing, spluttering, and sending out sharp, bluish flames. Berdyne shut off the power and applied the brakes.

Suddenly his grip relaxed, all his great strength going from him in a flash. Drooping like a broken reed, he tumbled headfirst from the car into the littered road.

Beryl, her lips moving voicelessly to frame the prayer that welled up from her heart, leaped out at the other side of the car.

A few minutes later, Berdyne, who had been merely stunned, got unsteadily to his feet in the roadway. Beryl had vanished, and the Red Flyer, seized by some of the frightened refugees who had found it standing idle, was gliding out of sight.

Recovering himself quickly and lashed to fury by the mishap, Berdyne rushed blindly along the street, seeking the fair, unfortunate girl who had escaped from him.

CHAPTER XIII.

ALONE.

Beryl's every motion, for the time, centered upon the one object—escape from the hateful power of Berdyne. The echo of his venomous voice rang in her ears, goading her flying feet to swifter pace. The unreasoning instinct of fear had laid hold of her and smothered every thought, every desire, save that of escape. She knew not whither her feet were carrying her, but fled on and on, fancying each moment she could hear Berdyne behind her. At last she tripped and fell exhausted, unable to rise.

"Faith, miss," cried a stout Irishwoman, "ye needn't be runnin' so hard. Sure, there's plenty av time for ivery sowl that's alive to get out av the city. Glory be!" she cried, astonished at the marvelous beauty revealed when Beryl raised her face. "It's a purty dear ye are, and the city's a bad place for wan with an angel's face like yours."

The Irishwoman had a hat box in one hand and a caged parrot in the other; a bedraggled little bonnet was on her head, and a coarse shawl hung over her plump shoulders. But there was a look of deep commiseration in her flushed face as she stood studying poor Beryl. Evidently a foreboding arose in her heart which she hesitated to put into words; the only way she gave expression to her thoughts was by a doleful shake of the head.

"Too bad, too bad, so it is!" she murmured. "Have ye any people anywhere near, my dear?"

That simple question brought realization to the forlorn little bride, and her tears began to flow. She remembered Neil and Tonita.

"My husband," she sobbed; "he is somewhere in this awful city! Oh, take me to him, take me to him!"

The Irishwoman sat down her load and sank to her knees beside the distraught girl.

"There, there," she said soothingly, "'tis wan av the things we must make the best of. Ye know, acushla, there's no helpin' the earthquakes, at all, at all. There's a little tremblin' under us now—but never mind. The worst has gone, but Heaven knows 'twas bad enough. Look at me, will ye? Me man Mike, the childher, an' mesilf all schattered to the four winds, yet I put me trust in the saints, an' I know we'll come together ag'in somehow. Where did ye l'ave yer husband?"

In Pine Street."

"What number?"

"I don't know the number, 'twas at the home of Reverend Mr. Bickerdyke."

"I don't know the gintleman, deary, but take that street beyant, turn to the left, an' go five blocks. That'll bring ye to Pine Street, an' mebbe ye can find the place. I'd go wid ye, but I'm hurrying to my sister's, out by Golden Gate Park, to see if any av the family are there."

The kind-hearted creature took off her shawl, and drew it around Beryl's shoulders, then kissed her in a motherly way and went on.

Beryl tried to call out her thanks, but her voice choked on the words. Rising unsteadily, she looked fearfully around.

She saw people hurrying, some one way and some another, each with a set, determined face. But Berdyne, to her intense relief, was nowhere to be seen. Then, as every thought flew back to Neil, her full heart overflowed. She must return to her darling, she must find him, and so stumbled onward with tear-blinded eyes.

Following the Irishwoman's instructions, she came finally to Pine Street, making sure of the thoroughfare by a corner sign. But the place where she entered the street was unfamiliar to her.

She knew practically nothing of the great city. Once she had come there with Tonita upon a pleasure excursion, but they had not stayed long enough to familiarize themselves with the streets. She felt that she would know the minister's house if she saw it, and if it had not been too sadly racked by the earthquake. All she could do was to walk up the middle of the street until she came to the place she was seeking.

Painfully she made her way onward, tripping again and again over the debris that littered the street, but always picking herself up bravely and pushing dauntlessly on. She dared not let herself think how grievously Neil might be hurt; she only prayed for strength and struggled forward.

It seemed as though she walked miles, and she knew she must have gone far beyond where the house stood. Several times she asked people she passed if they could tell her where the Reverend Mr. Bickerdyke's house was, but none of them knew. In an agony of doubt and fear she turned back on her path.

Perhaps it was as well that her brain was numbed and deadened to all else save the object of her search. Her tender soul would have sickened at the mighty desolation by which she was everywhere surrounded. Once, on that weary backward journey, she paused beside something that lay sprawled out in the road at her feet. It was a human form, terribly mangled. She gave it one dazed, swift look, and continued on her way unmoved. At any other time she would have shrunk from the sight in horror.

Of one fugitive after another she continued to inquire for the home of the minister; and it chanced, after a while, that fortune was kind.

"You have passed the place," said the last man of whom she inquired. "The minister lives in the next block west."

So, as it turned out, she had passed the house twice without knowing it. And small wonder! The structure had been so twisted, torn and defaced by the first dread shock that the minister himself might have passed it by.

The dust driven off by falling walls had settled, so that Beryl was able to see quite clearly. Her own emotions, driven back upon themselves, had left her tearless, wide-eyed, and like one threading the mazes of some horrible nightmare. She was drawing close to that fateful moment when she should learn whether her dearest love still lived, or whether the flickering hope she nursed in her bosom was false and destined to die. Yet,

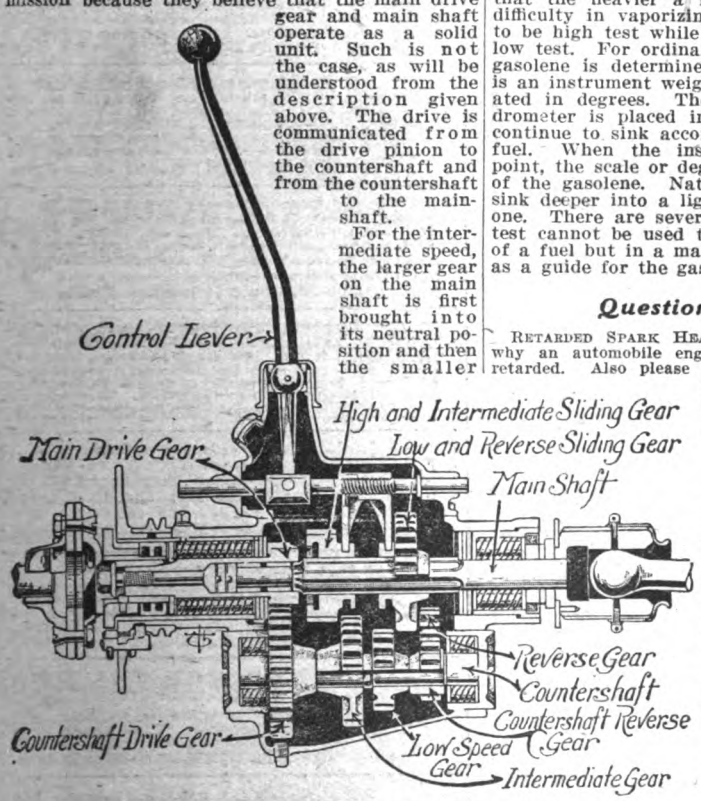
Sliding Gear Transmission



THE sliding gear is the type of transmission which has been accepted by the large majority of automobile and truck manufacturers. Stripped of technicalities, this type of transmission may be said to consist of a main drive gear, counter and main shafts and their gears. The main drive gear is formed at the end of a shaft which turns with the motor when the clutch is engaged. This gear is permanently in mesh with the large forward gear on the countershaft.

With the type of transmission at present considered (three speeds forward and one reverse) there are three gears keyed or otherwise securely fastened to the countershaft. On the main shaft there are two gears which are designed to be slid along and meshed with the gears on the countershaft. The larger of the two sliding gears is used to produce the low and reverse speeds while the smaller gear is for the intermediate and high speeds. The transmission is said to be neutral when the two sliding gears are riding free between their respective engaged positions.

Let us now consider that the operator has moved the gear shifting lever to the low speed position. His action would cause the larger sliding gear to mesh with the small gear on the countershaft. This condition would cause the main shaft to be revolved considerably slower than the engine and, of course, there would be a great reduction in the speed of the car.

In the writer's opinion, most people fail to comprehend the operation of the sliding gear transmission because they believe that the main drive gear and main shaft operate as a solid unit. Such is not the case, as will be understood from the description given above. The drive is communicated from the drive pinion to the countershaft and from the countershaft to the mainshaft.

For the intermediate speed, the larger gear on the main shaft is first brought into its neutral position and then the smaller gear slid along until it comes into mesh with a larger gear on the countershaft.

For the high speed, the small gear on the main shaft is taken out of mesh with the countershaft gear and is slid forward and in some manner coupled to the main drive gear so as to make the drive gear and main shaft one continuous shaft.

In some cases the sliding gear has internal teeth, in which case the drive gear is made sufficiently large to leave room for the meshing of the sliding gear.

Again, some transmissions form the high speed by dogs on the sliding and main drive gears. In this instance the gears clutch together to form the continuous shaft. The high gear is often referred to as the direct drive since it will be seen that the countershaft is not used for this speed.

For the reverse speed, with the two sliding gears in their neutral positions, the larger sliding gear is brought into mesh with a small idler gear which in turn is permanently meshed with a countershaft gear. It will be readily appreciated that through the use of an idler gear instead of engaging directly with a gear on the countershaft it is possible to change the direction of the main shaft.

Some sliding gear transmissions have four speeds forward and one reverse. Usually the third speed is used for the direct drive or "high" and the fourth speed is reserved for favorable conditions. The fourth gear speeds up the car without increasing the speed of the engine. It will be appreciated, however, that in order to make use of this gear it is necessary that the car be running under such conditions as to tax the engine but little for propulsion power.

Gear Set Arrangements

Sliding gear arrangements may be classified as using the progressive or the selective system for shifting. With the progressive sliding gear set a change can only be made from one speed to the next highest or the next lowest. For example, consider that the high speed gear was being used and it was desired to change to reverse. To bring about this condition it would be necessary to run through the intermediate and low speed gears in order to reach the reverse. In other words, the speeds must be taken in succession as it is impossible to jump a speed in order to reach a higher or lower one. As the name suggests, the selective sliding gear set permits the selecting of any speed without necessitating running through any other gears to reach it.

Some Useful Pointers

Guarding Against Freezing

When the car is stored in an unheated garage it is excellent practice to start the motor and allow the water in the cooling system to become warm after which to cover the hood and radiator with heavy robes or blankets. In many cases this practice will prevent the freezing of the water although the car is allowed to stand for many hours at a time. However, many new cars are being equipped with thermostats in the cooling system and it is therefore necessary to know that the circulation of the water is complete before covering the hood and radiator and allowing the car to stand. A thermostat is a device placed in the water line to prevent the water in the radiator from circulating around the engine until a certain temperature has been reached. It will therefore be appreciated that although the water around the motor may be quite warm, it is possible for the water in the radiator to be at almost freezing temperature. If the car is equipped with a thermostat, make certain that the motor is run long enough to insure the opening of the thermostat and the circulating of the water in the radiator. If an anti-freeze solution is used it will be unnecessary to warm up the water as above outlined.

Hard Starting

Difficulty in starting is to be expected during the cold weather. It is always a good plan to carry a squirt can filled with high test gasolene as priming the cylinders with this fuel will often effect a start when all other methods fail.

The Baume Test

Especially at this season of the year, one is very apt to notice that dealers advertise the gasolene as having a certain Baume test. Again, one may notice that gasolene is advertised as high or low test. Sufficient has been said about gasolene for the average motorist to appreciate that the heavier a fuel the more will be the difficulty in vaporizing it. A light fuel is said to be high test while a heavy fuel is said to be low test. For ordinary purposes the test of the gasolene is determined by a hydrometer. This is an instrument weighted at one end and graduated in degrees. The weighted end of the hydrometer is placed in the gasolene and it will continue to sink according to the density of the fuel. When the instrument finds its floating point, the scale or degrees is read at the surface of the gasolene. Naturally the hydrometer will sink deeper into a light gasolene than a heavier one. There are several reasons why the Baume test cannot be used to determine the real value of a fuel but in a majority of cases it will serve as a guide for the gasolene you buy.

Questions Answered

RETARDED SPARK HEATS ENGINE.—Please tell me why an automobile engine heats when the spark is retarded. Also please explain whether rich or lean mixture is best suited to slow speed, and which mixture is best suited to fast engine speed.

P. V., R. 1, Dixon, Ky.

A.—As you undoubtedly already know, the ideal condition is to have the spark take place in the cylinder when the piston passes top center and is just commencing on its downward stroke. You will appreciate that the explosion within the cylinder is extremely hot and with the piston in the position as above related, there will be only a small portion of the cylinder exposed to the intense heat. However, consider the other condition, viz., a late spark. By a late spark, we mean that the piston is about a third or a half way down. It is clear that when the explosion takes place with the piston in this position a considerable portion of the cylinder walls is exposed to the hot gases. It is quite evident that continued running of the motor due to the condition as outlined above will result in overheating. The gases in the cylinder are the hottest when the explosion occurs and they gradually cool as the expansion takes place. Another objectionable feature of a late spark is that the retarded explosion permits a flame in the cylinder when the piston is at the bottom of its stroke and naturally a certain portion of the flame will be forced through the exhaust valves, causing corrosion and warped stems. The safest policy to follow is to carry the spark to the farthest advance point without causing the motor to labor and knock. Whether it is a high or low-speed motor, in order to have full power and insure the best results there must be a mixture of gasolene properly proportioned to the air. If you will give the matter a little thought, you will probably realize that most of the modern carburetors adjust automatically to bring about this proportion. For example, when the motor is speeded up, naturally the greater suction causes more gasolene to be drawn around the spray needle. However, the same suction usually opens an auxiliary air valve, admitting additional air to mix with the gasolene and thereby maintain the proportion. The great requirement of a carburetor is to mix the fuel and air so as to maintain the proper proportion.

Home Mixing of Fertilizer

A very important saving in the fertilizer bill can be made by buying the ingredients and mixing at home. February is usually the time of slack work on farms in the South, and this will be an excellent time for farmers to lay in their supplies of fertilizing materials and do their home mixing, so that this work will be out of the way at the time of planting.

300 EGGS EVERY DAY

"Since using "TWO for ONE" I get 250 to 300 eggs a day instead of 25 or 30," writes J. C. Hoff of Indiana.

World's Greatest Egg Producer

"TWO for ONE" is the marvel of all egg tonics. It is the most remarkable producer of eggs ever known to the poultry world. "TWO for ONE" is making records every day in egg production that were never before believed possible. Flock owners all over the country are amazed with the results. The most experienced poultry experts say they have never seen the like of it.

"TWO for ONE" is not a mere food. It is an egg tonic in the truest sense of the term—a scientific preparation in concentrated tablet form—the result of scientific research and experiment. Every factor entering into the matter of egg production was scientifically studied.

As a result you have in "TWO for ONE" a tonic that conditions the hen for the utmost in laying capacity—that builds muscle and bone—that stimulates active functioning of the hen's reproductive organs—that insures fertile eggs and 100% hatchings—that makes the laggard lay and increases the production of active layers. A tonic that gets more eggs for you, winter and summer, than you ever thought possible.

$5000 Egg Laying Contest

Enter our $5000.00 egg laying contest. It's free to all users of "TWO for ONE." You not only double your egg production but you can win one of the big cash prizes we are giving every month. Full particulars in every box of "TWO for ONE."

Money-Back Guarantee

Don't take our word for it. Every box of "TWO for ONE" is sold under the distinct guarantee that if you are not entirely satisfied you get your money back. Take advantage of this offer and send for a box of "TWO for ONE" today.

Only $1.00 a box, or our special offer of $2.00 for large box containing as much as three $1.00 boxes—enough for an entire season. This costs you 1-15 of a cent a day, per hen, or less than 1c a dozen for the additional eggs you will receive from your flock.

Kinsella Co., 161 LeMoyne Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:—I want to increase the egg-laying ability of my hens, make more money out of my chickens and take advantage of the high prices that will be paid during the coming fall and winter. So please find enclosed $.....for a box of "TWO for ONE" as checked below:

(Check in squares opposite size wanted:)

SMALL SIZE (Including War Tax) $1.00 ☐

LARGE SIZE (Including War Tax) $2.00 ☐

This order entitles me to an entry in your $5,000.00 egg-laying contest, of which you are to send me full particulars, and my money is to be returned if I am not entirely satisfied with the tonic.

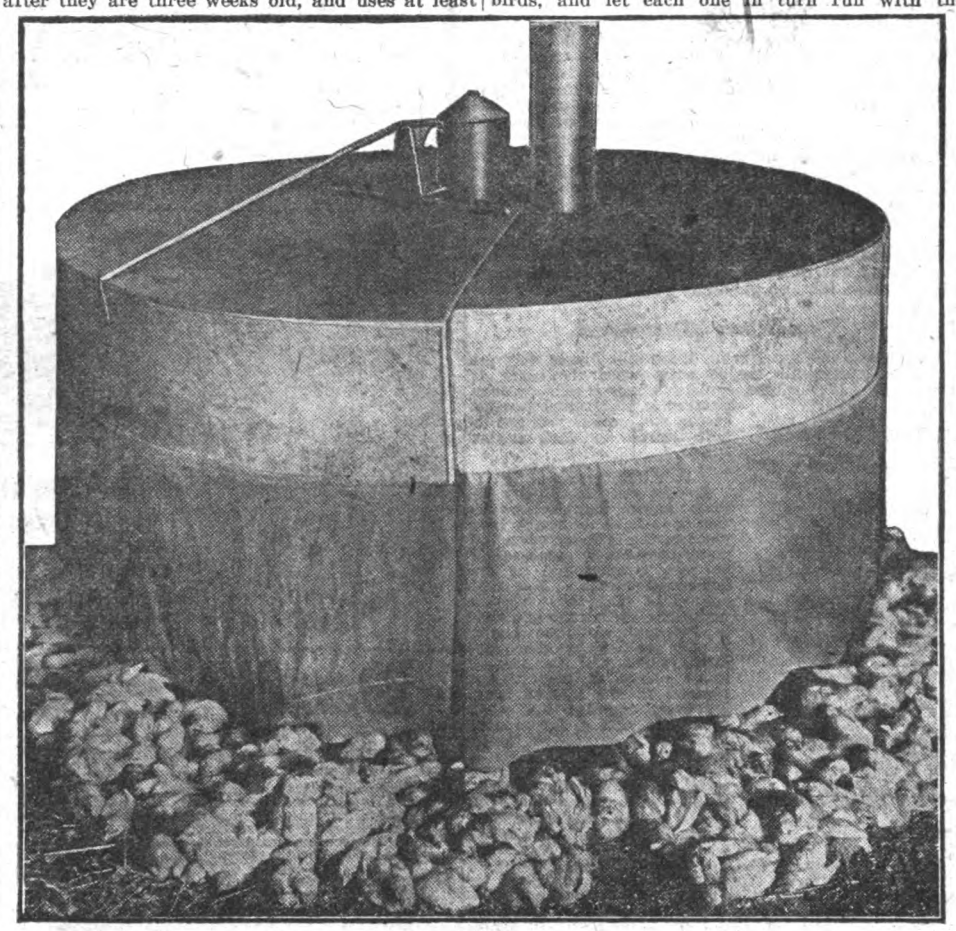
The Importance of a Good Brooder



A GOOD brooder must be in readiness for chicks hatched in an incubator. I have tried all sorts of brooders, from the home-made fireless to the large sized brooder house equipped with a full steam pipe system, and until two years ago always advocated the use of the outdoor lamp heated brooder for people rearing from one to two hundred chicks, but now I have come to the conclusion that the beginner with only a small incubator had better use fireless brooders which he can make himself from empty boxes or a lard tub, or if not handy with tools, one of the small fireless brooders can be bought for a few dollars, but when stock and experience have grown sufficiently to make a moderate sized incubator necessary, the cheapest and most practical method of brooding is the coal burner brooder, which costs no more than three ordinary lamp brooders, takes care of from three to five hundred chicks from the time they are hatched until they are beyond brooder age. It can be used in any ordinary home-made house, and is just as simple to look after as a parlor stove, yet has such reliable self-regulating attachments that there is no possible danger of overheating or chilling and is certainly cheaper to operate than lamp brooders, for the average lamp brooder, which is supposed to accommodate one hundred chicks, can really take good care of only fifty after they are three weeks old, and uses at least a quart of oil every twenty-four hours. So for five hundred chicks, at the end of three weeks, it would take two and a half gallons of oil per day. And then, the time it takes each day to fill, clean and regulate the flame of ten lamps. Time is a very serious consideration, especially in the busiest season, when every moment is of the greatest value. But setting aside the value of fuel and time, the coal burning brooder has two paramount advantages, in my estimation.

First: safety from fire. The stove is built with such a tight firebox and ash receiver, and has such a deep, solid base, that all danger of accident is eliminated, and we all know that lamp heaters of any description are prone to develop unaccountable kinks. Wicks will occasionally burn unevenly, and run up, and create soot to cause trouble, no matter how careful one is about trimming and cleaning.

The second advantage, the absence of all smell. Go into the house or room where two or three lamp burners are working; the air is vitiated and lifeless. Every living thing needs oxygen. Baby chicks are no exception. The brooder for the stove that burns coal warms the air, but does not eat up its life-giving qualities. And then the hover which accompanies the stove brooder is so large and deep that even five hundred chicks have plenty of room to spread out, and a constant circulation of well warmed air during the nights. So I advise our readers to save their money at first, use fireless brooders in a warm room until they are in a position to hatch a hundred chicks at one time, and then to invest in a coal burner brooder which can be placed in any house which is not less than ten feet square. The question of chimney need not be considered, as the pipe can go through the roof or side wall. We cut a hole in the back wall of a house 12x20, put up two posts on the outside 12 inches apart, with a flat stone resting on the top ends, to make a support for a piece of tile which is run through the hole in the house. The stove pipe is put through the tile, all space between the pipe and the tile being filled with cement. On the outside of the house one elbow and two lengths of tile made a perfectly good, safe smokestack. The stove, hover, regulating device and thermometer are all covered by thirty dollars. So you see it is not a heavy outlay, and it means raising strong, good chicks. But you must remember that sufficient strength cannot be put into chicks after they are hatched.

Parent birds must be fully developed, active and soundly healthy; otherwise their offspring cannot inherit such qualities. What is more, a hen must be supplied with food containing the elements from which bone and muscle are made, or her eggs cannot contain them. A strong germ may develop into a weak chick for want of the right kind of sustenance during the period of incubation.

Select only the largest, brightest hens for the breeding pens. Reject any which have shown signs of illness at any time of their lives. When eggs are the main point, only the best layers should be selected. Be just as particular about the male birds. From seven to twelve birds are enough for one flock. If you haven't the coops, or a long house divided into compartments with accompanying yards, and can't divide your birds into small flocks, adopt the alternating plan. Keep several male birds in a house and yard separated from the hens, and let only one run with the hens at a time, alternating them every day or every week, according to the number of hens. For example, if I were compelled to keep fifty hens in one flock, I would keep seven male birds, and let each one in turn run with the flock, rather than allow three or four birds to remain with the flock all the time.

ONE MOTHER BROODING SEVEN HUNDRED CHICKS.

Now, having drawn your attention to the items which must be observed in the management of the breeding stock to insure constitutional vigor in the embryo chick, we will pass on to the several causes which may cause even strong chicks to die in the shell. First, we will take the case of eggs set under hens. It often happens that hens will sit well until the last twenty-four hours, then get nervous and fidgety. Sometimes Biddy gets hungry or thirsty and leaves the nest. This is often the case when hens are allowed to sit in the chicken house or steal their nests around the farm buildings. But if no one happens to notice them when they come off to feed, they may go back to their nests with only a half-filled crop on the nineteenth or twentieth day, which will compel them to leave the nest again before the hatch is completed. As the warm weather advances in the spring, vermin may worry a hen into leaving her nest. Rats often scare a hen into leaving her nest when she is sitting outside, or another hen may fight her when trying to claim the nest to lay in. In fact, there are, of course, numerous accidental causes for the hens getting off the nest during the last forty-eight hours, when they should sit undisturbed.

Perhaps the most frequent cause of chicks dying in the shell when eggs are set under hens, is the owner's anxiety to help things along. During the last thirty-six hours, it is imperative that all the warmth and moisture generated by the developing chicks and the body of the hen should be retained in the nest, and if some one is perpetually lifting the hen from the eggs to take away hatched chicks or see what is happening, much of the moisture is allowed to escape, and the last two or three eggs fail to hatch, though they often contain fully developed chicks. An extremely dry season generally brings lots of complaints about chickens dying in the shell. The best way to combat adverse conditions is to remove broody hens from the chicken house and set them in clean nests in a house or shed which can be closed so that a quantity of whole corn and clean water can be left in readiness for Biddy to feed herself with whenever she comes off of the nest. It is well also to put a shallow box of fine coal ashes in the house where the hens are sitting, so that they can dust themselves every time they leave the nest. If it is a dry season, sprinkle water on the floor of the house every two or three days. When it comes to hatching time, listen, and if you hear any peeping in the morning, restrain your curiosity until late in the evening, then carefully slip your hand under the hen and remove as many dry chicks and broken egg shells as you can find easily and in a short space of time. It won't hurt to leave one or two chicks under a hen, but don't make the mistake of going to the other extreme of leaving nests entirely alone, because if you do, you are very apt to find chicks crushed or dead.

The next day, leave things to nature until late in the afternoon; then remove the hen to a brood coop, and give her the chicks which are hatched, for if there are any still in the shell, they will be too weak to amount to anything if hatched later.

When the incubator has been used, the cause for chicks dying in the shell is usually want of proper ventilation, or the heat running down, or the door being opened during the last forty-eight hours. Ventilation can be best gauged by the appearance of the air cell when the egg is held before the tester. The so-called air cell is the space at the large end of the egg. In a newly laid egg it is very small. After the egg has been in the incubator for seven days, there is quite a visible space, and as evaporation progresses, it increases until the nineteenth day, when it should occupy one fifth of the entire shell. If there is not sufficient ventilation in the incubator, evaporation will be retarded, and there will not be sufficient room in the shell for the chick to twist its head round and break its way out; and it will die, though fully developed. If the development of the air cell is too slow, the ventilator in the incubator should be opened a little wider, and the eggs aired a little longer each day when you take out the traps to air the eggs. If the development of the air cell is too rapid, reverse the conditions and put a sponge of hot water in the machine on the nineteenth day. After turning the eggs on the morning of the nineteenth day, don't open the machine again until the hatch is over, and be very careful that the heat does not run down during that time. It may go up to 104 degrees, or even to 105 without doing any harm, but it must not sink below 103.

Now, let us come back to the chicks themselves. They should be left in the incubator for the first twenty-four hours after they are hatched. Incubation takes twenty-one days. Remember to count from the hour you put the eggs in the machine. Say it is four o'clock in the afternoon. They will not have been in the machine a day until four o'clock the following afternoon. Lots of people count one day, no matter what hour they put the eggs in the machine, and eight or nine hours make a lot of difference when it comes to the end of the incubation period.

Remember, little chicks will get bowel trouble if they get chilled, so always use plenty of cotton in the top of the brooder, and never have less than twenty-five chickens in a brooder, for less than that number can't supply sufficient bodily heat to warm the air inside of the brooder, and never neglect to take out the cotton and air it near a fire.

Watch the droppings of all chickens, both brooder and those under hens, and at the

Get More Eggs; Save Feed

Sky-high prices for eggs this winter will make big profits for those who know how and what grain mixtures to feed. Improper methods mean big loss. Prof. T. E. Quisenberry made a thousand hens in the American Egg-Laying Contest lay 200 to 304 eggs each in a year. Another big flock cleared for him $6.15 per hen in nine months. His methods are explained in a new bulletin, "How to Get More Eggs and Save Feed." Poor Seed, Poor Policy

A FRIEND of ours who had his big garden patch heavily fertilized, deeply plowed and well pulverized at considerable expense, talked loud and long of the great crops of vegetables he was going to raise. He had moved from the city to its outskirts that he might have a large garden and immense supplies of green stuff, roots, fruits and flowers, and he certainly made a good start in the preparation of the soil. But then he made a terrible mistake and one that thousands of other men make each year, on a large or small scale, for he bought his supply of seeds from a marked down stock at prices that seemed most attractive as displayed in a grocery store window.

The price asked for the seed was a low one, compared with that charged by the professional seedsman on a nearby street, but it was tremendously high, in fact, and our friend found his investment a most expensive one as the days and weeks went by and weeds proved practically the only crop in his garden. For the grocer's stock of old, shopworn, "job lot" seeds was worthless. Few of them came through the ground, and those that managed to struggle up failed to make a vigorous or healthy growth. Had they matured, it is quite likely, too, that the varieties would have proved poor in quality or low in yield.

Another man of our acquaintance read in the winter time about the mammoth soy bean and what a fine plant it was to have grow along with drilled corn for the silo. He was converted to the soy bean doctrine by what he read and after getting his corn land into splendid condition—"like an ash heap," he said—a supply of soy bean seed had to be bought. His corn seed was first class in quality, for he had saved it himself, and testing showed that its germinating powers were well over ninety per cent, but where to obtain soy beans was the question. At last he heard of a man who had some to sell and from him he bought what he needed and "took his word for it" that germination would be satisfactory. He treated the seed with an inoculation culture of root nodule forming germs, but not a solitary bean sprouted. To find out what soy beans look like when growing, our friend had to visit a neighbor and view his flourishing crop produced from sound, live seed bought from the professional seedsman, who is a man of fine repute and great experience.

What poor, poor policy is this purchasing of poor seed! "Penny wise, pound foolish" policy it is, for although the poor seed was cheap in price, its use proved a most expensive piece of policy.

It is certain that one cannot too well fertilize and prepare the seed bed for any field or garden crop, and just as certain that when all is ready the only wise policy is to purchase and plant the very best quality of seed, of known, named, pedigree sort, tested and guaranteed strong in germinating powers and suitable for the district in which it is to be grown.

Such safe, profitable seed can only be obtained from a professional seedsman of experience and first-class reputation. The established seed house cannot afford to sell poor seed. To do so not only would be poor but ruinous policy, and it isn't practiced. Rather than disappoint his customers and lose their trade and that of their friends, the reputable seedsman rejects great quantities of doubtful seed each season, and it is ground for feed or disposed of for some purpose other than planting.

Readers of COMFORT should give these matters careful consideration, and before seeding-time arrives lay in a supply of reliable seeds or arranged to have them supplied at a certain time by a reputable seedsman. To that end they should send for the catalogues of seed firms that advertise, and study what is stated there about the seeds offered. Seed houses that advertise in COMFORT will give prompt attention to your request for catalogue if you mention that you saw their advertisement in COMFORT.

The great seed houses have the capital necessary to raise or buy sufficient quantities of the best seeds and to store and test them properly. From such firms one will be sure to obtain supplies that will prove satisfactory and profitable.

Sweet Scented Herbs for the Garden

No garden is complete without there is a place in it for the herbs which our grandmothers made so much use of and of which the modern housewife should learn the value for garnishing, flavoring and for making cordials.

Herbs for Perfume

For perfuming linen what can be more dainty than the lingering odor given by the sprigs of lavender laid among its folds?

The lavender plants may be raised from seeds or the bed started with plants. Many seed houses have these plants "pot grown" and as the plant is a perennial this is a very satisfactory way to start your bed as the pot-grown plant gets little or no setback from transplanting.

Herbs for Flavor

It is possible to give to the plainest soup a delicate and delicious flavor by utilizing many of the herbs which are so easy to grow and which the housewife should have in her garden in summer and which she can cut, dry and tie in bunches and have ready for use during the winter.

For flavoring cookies and bread, the anise and caraway seeds are good. Anise plants are a fine garnish and the flavor is used in making cordials. The stems and seeds of sweet basil add flavor to soups and sauces. The dill is splendid for making pickles and seasoning. The sweet fennel is a good salad plant. Everybody knows the use of sage leaves for flavoring cheese and stuffing for poultry, also summer savory for meats and soups.

Herbs for Medicine

Many herbs have medicinal value, such as the balm, castor oil bean, catnip, horehound and pennyroyal.

The woman on the farm who has plenty of garden room should have a good-sized herb bed, and even the city garden should include as many as possible of these plants which add so much to the savory of the cooking, the daintiness of the linen closet and no small addition to the medicine cabinet.

The Milk Sheet

No owner of even a simple dairy cow can afford to be without a milk sheet. But some one asks, "What is a milk sheet?" Simply this: A sheet of paper hung up in the barn or in some other convenient place on which is recorded the names of the cows and the number of pounds of milk given by each cow at each milking, both night and morning.

WHERE TO GET MILK SHEETS.—Make them yourself. Any sheet of plain paper, big enough, will do. Rule it both ways with a pencil. There should be at least sixty-three spaces up and down, two for each day in the month and an extra one at the bottom for the total. Across the top are enough spaces for the names of all the cows in the herd. Under these names are recorded in order the weights of the milk given by each cow at each milking. Or, if preferred, a weekly instead of a monthly sheet can be used, in which case fifteen spaces, two for each day in the week and one for the total, will answer. However, the monthly sheet is much better as will be seen later.

No one needs to make his own milk sheets. Most of the state colleges of agriculture prepare and distribute these sheets to farmers within the state and they can always be had free for the asking direct from the United States Department of Agriculture at Washington, D. C.

OF WHAT USE IS A MILK SHEET?—The milk sheet is the "intelligence office" of every well-ordered dairy farm. Near the milk sheet hangs a scale upon which the milk is easily and quickly weighed. Attached by a string hangs a pencil which can always be found for instant use. Only a moment's time is taken in getting and recording the weight. A glance across the sheet shows immediately how each cow compares with the other in the amount of milk she gives, and the farmer soon finds himself saying, "Nobby is the best heifer in the bunch," or "Topsy is no good." In other words, by the use of the milk sheet he soon forms the habit of comparing his cows in a way that he would never do without it.

What next? Better than all, he watches himself. Do the cows stand and shiver in a cold and drizzling rain? Instantly the effect is noticed on the milk sheet. Does he change in his feed? The milk sheet records the result. Pastures get short in summer. The milk sheet lifts a warning hand. The thoughtful farmer through the use of the milk sheet soons forms the habit of watching himself in his care of the cows.

GOOD LESSONS TAUGHT BY THE MILK SHEET.—Probably the first lesson that the farmer will learn in a way that he will never forget is that:

(1) Cows must be protected from bad weather. Rain or snow, sleet, hail, or a driving wind always lessens the milk flow. A dollar a day can easily be taken out of the income from a herd of ten or twelve cows at the present prices of milk by leaving them out in bad weather.

(2) Cows must have plenty of salt and fresh water. Salt the cows heavily and give them free access to pure, fresh water and the result shows in the milk sheet.

(3) Cows must get plenty of protein rich feed to produce milk. Feed cows hay, corn-stalks and ground corn and oats, or any other farm grown ration. Then add to this a pound or two a day of some especially rich-in-protein feed, like cottonseed meal, oil meal or bran and the milk sheet shows the result. By a little figuring it also shows whether it pays or not to increase the feed.

(4) Cows must be milked regularly by the same milker. Change milkers and the milk sheet shows the result. The effect of irregular milking also shows up in the milk sheet.

There is no other so great an education to the dairy farmer as the milk sheet. Get one and tack it up in the cow barn.

The Babcock Test

Having learned to use the milk sheet, the next big step in the education of the dairy farmer is the lesson that he can learn by using the Babcock Test. Practically all payment for milk the country over is made on the basis of the fat test. Cows cannot be compared on the amount of milk alone, but rather on the amount of milk taken in conjunction with the test. The questions to ask about any cows are, "How much milk does she give?" and, "How much does it test?"

In conjunction with the milk sheet there should be used the Babcock Test.

How to Use the Test

It isn't necessary to use the test every day or even every month, for that matter. Feed does not affect the test. Neither does weather or care affect it greatly. Poor health or bad conditions are about the only things which affect the test. A cow's fat test is "born in her," and once determined it changes little from month to month, or year to year. A high-testing heifer will be a high-testing cow, and a "low-test" heifer is pretty certain to develop into a "low-test" cow. It is only necessary then to determine the test of a cow at a few different times during the year. The average of these can usually be taken as her average test. Multiplying the total amount of milk recorded on the milk sheet by the average test will give you the true value of the cow as a producer for any given period.

How the Test Varies

It must be remembered that the test of any cow varies in two important ways. As the lactation period advances the milk gets richer, hence a "stripper's" milk is always richer than that of the same cow when fresh. This must be taken into account when computing the average test. It must always be remembered that as milking progresses the milk is constantly getting richer—the strippings always being much richer than the milk first drawn during the same milking.

Driven Apart

despite her stony fortitude, every sense was now strangely on the alert.

She observed how the upper part of the front wall of the minister's dwelling had fallen outward, covering the approach to the door with a heap of broken timbers. With critical eye she selected the best path across this mound of debris, and her step quickened with her eagerness to be over the barrier and within the house. Just as she was on the point of turning from the littered sidewalk her course was barred by a tube of shining steel.

"There is danger in the house, young lady," said a voice. "You must not go farther."

She turned with a gasp, and beheld a man in regimental blue, surveying her with firm but kindly eyes.

"Ah, do not stop me!" she begged. "The one I loved best in all the world was in that house when the shock came!"

The soldier marveled at her loveliness, at the marble beauty of her face.

"There is no one in there now, miss," said he gently. "Or, if there is——" He paused, for something deep in her eyes forbade his wounding her with what he was about to say.

She sank to her knees, and caught at one of his hands.

"Do not, do not stop me!" she whispered. "If the one I seek is dead, I pray Heaven that the walls may crush me down at his side."

The soldier was touched.

"I'm sorry, miss," he returned, "but I am stationed here to keep everyone from entering the buildings in this block. The peril is great, and——" He was interrupted by a crash as part of the wall of the next building tumbled over upon the rear part of the minister's ruined house. "You see how it is," he added, with a tightening of the lips.

"I care not for danger," she cried, springing up, "but I cannot rest, I will not know a moment's peace, until I learn my darling's fate."

"Your lover?" he asked.

"My husband!" she answered, straightening her lithe form.

"If you will wait here, miss," said he, gallantly, "I will go in there myself. 'Tis hard to deny anything to one so fair."

He turned to set down his rifle and carry out his generous offer, but the moment he turned Beryl bounded past him and over the rugged timbers.

"I cannot send you to danger," said she, with a hallowed sweetness, pausing a moment at the crest of the barrier.

Another moment, and the startled soldier saw her gain the door and vanish within the ruined edifice.

"If you do not return in a few moments," said he, "I shall go after you."

Although the words were called loudly, Beryl did not hear them. She was in the disordered room which had witnessed the happiest and the bitterest moment of her life. The furniture was overturned and broken; the floor was heaped with debris and thick with plaster which had fallen from the walls. But Neil was not there—no one was there!

"Neil, my husband! Where are you?"

Her anguished tones echoed quiveringly through the room. Heedless of every danger, she ran from one apartment to another, then up the stairs to the great, gaping void of the second floor, calling, calling, but receiving no response.

To the soldier, waiting outside, she seemed gone a fearfully long time. Reproaching himself for his carelessness in letting her pass him, he was on the point of following when she appeared in the doorway, scaled the barrier lightly, and was again at his side.

"You found no one?"

She smiled at him vacantly, and there was such a look on her beautiful face as smote him with pity. She turned silently, still with her gentle, unmeaning smile, and flitted away.

"Wait!" the soldier called.

She paid no heed, and quickly vanished from the sight of the guard.

"Too bad, too bad!" murmured the man. "But, in this city, today, there must be hundreds of cases like hers."

Thereupon, he shook his head sadly, shouldered his rifle, and continued his measured tramp.

Town Plants 900 Plants

New Bedford, Mass., set out 900 trees last spring and this town claims that it almost holds the record for the number of trees it possesses in proportion to street mileage, according to a report to the American Forestry Association, of Washington, whose campaign for memorial trees for soldiers and sailors was nation-wide and which was registering all such trees.

"I see not a step before me
As I tread on another year,
But the past is still in God's keeping,
The future His mercy shall clear,
And what looks dark in the distance
May brighten as I draw near."

ISN'T that a nice hopeful thought to start the new year with, and you never even suspected I was such a trusting young person as that, did you? Maybe I'm not always trustful of people, though I do give them the benefit of the doubt, but we never have occasion to do that with God, though I feel sure He must have to make all kinds of allowances for us, so let's resolve to be as little bother as possible throughout the coming year, and may it bring all of you that which you wish for most.

CURLY HEAD, Ala.—Your thirteen-year-old schoolmate is wrong when she says you are missing half your life because you do not have a fellow. And your uncle is wrong, too, when he tells you that as long as you love your schoolbooks and music you will never marry. The educated and accomplished girl should, and generally does, stand a better chance of marrying than the uneducated, unaccomplished girl, and of holding her husband's love once she is married. Home is the best place but don't stay there so closely that you won't know what to do when among strangers.

HARRY, Okla.—Girls are funny things, aren't they, Harry, and with the density peculiar to your sex you'll never be able to understand them. Can't you effect a compromise with this girl of yours? You to stay on with your work and visit her every few weeks? Or are you near enough for that? It is difficult for the average girl to forgive a man for accepting a position that takes him away from her, even if he earns more money there and she knows it is better for him. She wants him to want to be near her and not happy unless he is. Maybe it is her pride and not her love that is hurt. I've often wondered if it wasn't. Make sure the other fellow hasn't gotten the inside track before you give up a good position for her sake. You can get another girl easily enough. You don't know that you can never be happy without her any more than you know you could be happy with her. Old Father Time is the best doctor in the world and heals more broken hearts than he can count.

BROWN EYES AND BLUE EYES, of Gloryland.—A girl of fourteen may wear a coat suit provided it is something simple and girlish—Norfolks are particularly good, but she shouldn't wear high heels. (2) Either is correct.

MISS C., Indiana.—It is quite the proper thing to trust to Providence but I rather think you are overdoing it when you contemplate marrying a man who lets his old maid sister decide just what he shall do and who expects to have you do as she says. Have it definitely understood before you marry him that you are to be mistress in your own home and boss of your husband if anyone is to boss him.

G, Montana.—The man who just "hints" about marriage is no kind of a sport at all. He plays a safe bet all the time but it leaves the girl in rather an uncertain position. She is "neither fish nor fowl nor good red herring" or, in other words, she hasn't the freedom of an unengaged girl nor the rights of an engaged one, and the man, after monopolizing the best years of her life to the exclusion of some other man who would have married her, is free to walk away and leave her. You are young yet and can well afford to wait a while longer, but if he shows no disposition to ask you outright to be his wife, don't waste too much time on him.

MARY, W. Va.—A great many happy marriages have been founded on respect alone but whether it is as well to marry without love as with love I cannot say. That would depend upon the persons themselves and to circumstances to a great extent. I'd rather marry without love and with respect than love without respect, but the ideal combination would be love and respect, so why not wait until you find it? Marry someone you would like if you didn't love him.

QUESTION BOX, California.—It may have been all right for thirteen-year-old girls to have attended a nightshirt parade (I don't know whether they are respectable or not) but it was all wrong for them to go with some fellows to a town thirty miles distant and not get home until after midnight. California mothers must be careless indeed. You are only thirteen years old, no matter if you are as large as a girl of eighteen, and you should behave as nice little girls of thirteen should behave. Acting on your theory, I suppose if an eighteen-year-old girl were very small she should have bread and milk for supper and go to bed at seven? Your letter shows more brains than your questions would indicate.

A BUCKEYE GIRL.—I can understand about how you feel but I rather hesitate to advise you because I do not know you or your fiance and doubtless I'd hesitate just as much if I did. This giving advice for or against marriage is, in the majority of cases, an awful responsibility. Offhand, I should say that a girl of eighteen should never marry a man of thirty-six, particularly when she regards him more as a father than a lover. On the other hand, he might be so kind and good to her that she would be happier married to him than to a younger fellow who wouldn't be so kind even though she loved him more than she did the older man. An equal amount of love on both sides is the ideal combination but it doesn't always happen that way and you'll have to decide for yourself whether you'd be happier to love your husband more than he loved you or just the reverse. The selfish old-maid side of me would choose the latter, but do as you think best.

MAZIE, N. C.—Looking at the question from a sentimental viewpoint, you should continue to wear your engagement ring on the engagement finger even though your fiance died in service. But if you do it will tend, or should anyway, to keep other men away who might become interested in you if they thought you were free.

TEDDY, Ky.—I should think from your description that you should wear your dresses nearly to your shoetops, but have them girlish, one-piece dresses and do your hair in a simple manner, preferably down your back, and don't dress old just because you are larger than the average girl of your age. Your letter was very well written and you seem to be a sensible girl. I almost said "little girl."

ANCIOUS GIRL, Wis.—What a paradise for housewives Wisconsin must be. To think of a girl washing dishes for twelve people, waiting on table, making beds, sweeping, dusting, ironing and helping with the cooking all for $2.00 a week. You underrate your value. Don't exchange smiles with any man if he thinks you are chasing him. Tell me, why the "e" in anxious?

GLADYS, W. Va.—If he is so neglectful as a lover what do you suppose he would be like as a husband? Nay, nay, Gladys, don't take any foolish chances.

MICKEY, W. V.—It would be all right to forgive him and give him another chance if you want to, but don't take him back if he strays again. That would be a bad habit for a husband to have.

EULA, Texas.—If I knew a safe and sure method of winning a man's love you don't suppose I'd be an old maid, do you? Why, I'd have six husbands anyway. (2) "What is the cheerfulest subject to talk on when you are out with your fellow?" There are a number of cheerful things to talk about, but an interesting subject—to the man—is to let him talk about himself. The dear things love to do it; it bores one to death sometimes but it is the surest way of making men think you are interesting.

ANNIE, S. C.—Hope chests are like grab-bags, they can contain almost anything. It would be well to start with the necessary articles for a home, such as quilts, sheets and pillow cases, plain or embroidered, towels—bath, guest, dish and all other varieties. Crocheted or tatted doilies and centerpieces and dresser scarfs and silver and dishes all belong there. Start in anywhere and you will be all right.

CHUMS, Texas.—Your letter was received too late for me to answer your first question in time to be of service but in case it comes up again I'll tell you that in my opinion you are too young to go to dances with boys even if they are "sure cute" and have automobiles. That's a combination hard to resist, I know. It would be all right if your mothers went along, too. (2) No, it isn't right for girls your age, or any age, to paint. The length of your skirts should be determined by your size, but don't wear 'em too short. (3) What does it mean when a boy winks and smiles at you at the same time? Are you sure he didn't wiggle his ears? He didn't? Well, well, that's too bad. If he had, it would have been a sure sign that he was madly in love with you. Now I fear he isn't.

MRS. C., Okla.—Well, aren't you the spineless creature! Do you think for a minute if I were a pretty young wife of seventeen that I'd sit down and cry because my forty-year-old husband talked about the pretty girls he had seen during the day? I should say not. I'd smilingly agree that she was a very pretty girl and that beauty ran in the family because she had the nicest looking brother, cousin, father or grandfather that I had ever seen, and the nicest dressed, etc., etc. For every nice thing he said about some girl I'd say something much nicer about some man who is better looking than he is. That ought to cure him.

HILDA, Ind.—Your woman friend has no right inflicting such cynical views upon your young mind, simply because she had been unfortunate in her experiences with men. A great many men are untrue to their wives, but don't let anyone make you believe that all of them are. (2) From your description I think your friend must be an exceptionally fine fellow.

It is so much easier to be good if people are kind, so I tried to be extra kind this month and not scold very much.

The Modern Farmer

Hence, the sample for testing must always be taken from the entire milking, thoroughly mixed, never milked directly into the test bottle.

If the farmer will bear these two things in mind and test his cows occasionally to get their fat test and then use it in connection with the milk sheet, he can soon have a herd of high-producing cows.

Full Feeding for Dairy Cows

Readers of COMFORT have been advised many times that if one is to get from a dairy cow a maximum production of milk and butter fat content she must be adequately fed. The general rule to that end is to feed at least one pound of a properly composed concentrated feed ration for each three or four pounds of milk produced daily, and somewhat more if the milk is very rich in butter fat. Many farmers, on the contrary, feed just enough to keep the cow alive through the winter and she generally comes out thin and weak in spring. A cow so underfed may produce some milk and the amount yielded is accounted a profit by the owner. That is a poor way of figuring in the dairy business. It only pays to keep and feed cows that are bred to produce a large amount of milk and butter fat and to so feed such cows that the maximum possible through heredity may be obtained. Starvation rations may bluff the cow, but they also cheat the dairyman of the profit he should have from his capital invested and work expended.

To help farmers feed properly, the Wisconsin College of Agriculture, Extension Division, has sent out a most useful and practical little circular on the subject of dairy cow management and feeding and from it we take the following items of interest and instruction:

In addition to the concentrated feed mentioned, a dairy cow requires 30 pounds of corn silage and 10 pounds of hay, or 30 pounds of roots and fifteen pounds of hay, or eight pounds dried beet pulp soaked for 24 hours, and 10 pounds of hay, or 20 pounds of clover or alfalfa hay, or 20 pounds timothy, prairie, or marsh hay with one to two pounds of oilmeal.

Some properly balanced concentrate rations are advised, as follows: Ground oats, 200 pounds, corn and cob meal, wheat bran, oilmeal and gluten feed or dried brewers' grains, of each 100 pounds; mix. Or ground oats, cornmeal or barley meal and wheat bran, of each 100 pounds; cottonseed meal and oilmeal, of each 25 pounds. Or ground barley, 400 pounds; wheat bran, 200 pounds; gluten feed and oilmeal, of each 100 pounds. Or ground oats, cornmeal, and gluten feed, of each 200 pounds; wheat bran, 300 pounds, and oilmeal, 100 pounds. Or ground oats, 200 pounds, wheat, 100 pounds, and oilmeal, 50 pounds. Or ground oats, ground barley and wheat bran, of each 200 pounds, and oilmeal, 100 pounds.

When fed with silage and good clover or alfalfa hay, it may not pay to give ground oats, ground corn or ground corn and cob meal, or barley meal alone. On the contrary, it may pay to sell some of the home-grown grain and buy protein-rich feeds to balance the ration. The above quoted combinations show how this may be done.

Saving Feed

Feed is worth too much to waste, yet how often do we see farmers wasting feed! Perhaps wasting it without even giving a thought to its value. Or else, they waste it because they think they cannot afford the necessary buildings or equipment to save it. Or they waste it because they haven't time, or think they haven't time, to harvest it properly.

WASTING CORN.—One great waste is the corn that is left on the ground after cutting with a binder. This binder always knocks off a great many ears which should be picked up and fed to stock. If the field is so that hogs can be turned in, which is often the case where the corn has been cut into the silo—hogs will clean up this waste. If not, then the corn should be picked up. There is no other way where the hired man can earn so good wages for the farmer as in picking up this corn.

Another way that corn is badly wasted on many farms is in feeding it to hogs. It is thrown into the mud and rooted over and tramped in—and lost. Hogs ought to have a table to eat on just like other folks, where their food will be kept clean. A good feeding floor can be made of planks, rough side up to prevent hogs from slipping in wet weather, but the best feeding floor for hogs is made of concrete with a rim around the edge to prevent the corn from being pushed off into the mud.

SELF-FEEDERS.—The use of self-feeders is a good way to save feed. If properly constructed the hogs or other animals help themselves. Of course, self-feeders can only be used where it is intended that the animals are to have all the feed they want. By the use of self-feeders, however, every bit of the feed removed from the feeder is eaten. What is left over remains inside the feeder. None is wasted. If hand fed it often happens that the left-over feed is entirely wasted.

KEEP FEED UNDER COVER.—If possible, feed should be kept under cover. It is not a good plan to feed daily from the stack, since rain and snow always spoil a good deal of the feed. If feed is taken from the stack to feed it is the best plan to cut down the stack clear to the bottom and haul the "cut" into the barn or put it some place under cover so that none will be wasted by weather. Straw and corn-stalks, while much cheaper feeds, are less wasted if kept under cover while feeding. It is a very wasteful plan to let cattle run to the straw stack as much straw is pulled out and tramped into the ground around the stack. Corn fodder should be hauled and put under cover in a dry time when the stalks are perfectly dry. If they are left standing in the field they rot in wet weather and if they are put into the barn when damp they mold under cover. Stalks should be kept dry when feeding in order to avoid waste.

SWEEPING UP.—Much feed is wasted on many farms because it isn't kept "swept up." Very dry alfalfa will scatter badly. The dry leaves that break off in feeding are the best of feed, about the equal of bran pound for pound. This should never be wasted. Keep the feeding floor swept and give the sweeping to pigs and chickens. Alfalfa sweepings are the finest feed in the world to make hens lay.

The same care should be used in sweeping the feeding trough after feeding bran or other mill feeds. The hogs will eat what the cows leave if given a chance. Have you ever stopped to think that there is no kind of concentrated feed that now costs less than two cents a pound? At present quotations, farm grains are worth nearly three cents a pound, and a pound isn't much. It pays to save the sweepings.

OVERFEEDING.—A good deal of rough feed is wasted by overfeeding. Stock is given more than it will clean up. In other words, it is overfed. After hay or other rough feed has been once "nosed over" by cattle they refuse to eat it and then it is wasted by being thrown into the beddings. Don't feed too much, but just what the stock will clean up clean if you want to save feed.

Legumes—Lime—Livestock

This has been chosen as a slogan in many parts of the country—But why legumes? And if legumes, why lime? And what relation do they both bear to livestock?

Perhaps it would be clearer to state it the other end to: Livestock—Legumes—Lime.

A NATION OF MEAT EATERS.—We are a nation of meat eaters. If we are to eat meat we must grow it. Only one other country—South America—eats more meat than we do, and we used to eat more than we do now.

In the Argentine the average meat consumption per year is nearly three hundred pounds to the person. Here we eat a little over half of that or about one hundred and sixty-five pounds a person or not quite half a pound a day. Some European countries consume less than a pound a week per person. How does it happen that we eat so much meat? And why is this consumption growing less?

The answer is simple. Most everybody likes meat and when meat is cheap much is eaten. Cheap land means cheap meat. High-priced land means dear meat with small meat consumption.

CHINA A GOOD EXAMPLE.—Land is high priced in China. Population is dense and every foot is needed to raise food for human beings. Hence little meat can be grown, and consequently little can be eaten. Give us time enough and we will reach the same condition unless we devise better systems of farming. What we need first is quick-growing, easily fattened livestock to keep up our meat supply. Only a minimum of grain fit for human food should be fed to livestock. We need to make our meat as quickly and as cheaply as we can make it.

THEN WHY LEGUMES.—Meat and milk are much more dependent upon legumes—such as peas, beans, soy beans, clover and alfalfa. Fed to livestock, legumes produce rapid, rangy healthy growth. They make quick growing meat. Hence, on every livestock farm we need quick growing legume feed both for dairy cattle and for meat animals.

WHY LIME?—On old farms that have long raised crops, legumes do not grow well. The soil has become sour from continuous cropping. This sour soil must be sweetened before legumes will grow on it. Lime is a soil "sweetener." Not burned lime but ground lime rock. When this is applied to sour soils legumes are grown, livestock can also be grown rapidly and cheap meat results. Hence the slogan, Legumes—Lime—Livestock.

Questions and Answers

HOW TO FEED PIGS.—I will thank you to answer the following questions: (1) About how much feed is required to feed and fatten a pig from weaning time until it weighs 250 pounds, provided the pig is thrifty and is fed on corn, oats and bluegrass pasture? (2) I have 120 bushels of corn and 20 bushels of oats. How many pigs can I feed and fatten to weigh 200 pounds on this quantity of grain? (3) How much corn and oats are required to feed a sow pig from weaning until she weighs 200 pounds and have her in good condition for breeding? R. M., Coldwater, Mich.

A.—If pig has a little skim milk to go with the grain feed, it will take from three to four pounds of grain for each pound of grain. You ought to raise a pig from weaning to 250 pounds weight if kept growing steadily, on 10 bushels each of corn and oats with a quart or two of skim milk a day. Four bushels of oats to twelve bushels of corn would be a better combination. (2) On the basis that it takes four pounds of grain to make one pound of pork, you ought to feed and fatten from nine to ten pigs on this amount. With skim milk and pasture in addition, you should be able to raise from 10 to 12 pigs on this. (3) A good brood sow should have skim milk and pasture with some protein-rich feed like middlings, oil meal, or tankage. She will not need so much grain. Two or three bushels of corn in addition to the above will be sufficient. As a general rule, it is safe to figure one pound of grain for each four pounds of feed fed to pigs under 200 pounds.

ROOTS FOR HORSES.—Kindly tell me whether carrots and potatoes are good feed for horses, and, if so, how they should be fed. MRS. M. A. M., Olney, Mont.

A.—Carrots are the best of all roots for a horse. Wash them clean and feed them whole or sliced. Start slow and watch the bowels. Do not allow enough to make the bowels too loose. Too many carrots fed suddenly may cause colic or scours. Raw potatoes are good for clearing worms from the bowels of colts, but seem to have little feeding value for horses, and sometimes cause choke. Carrots, parsnips and rutabagas are greatly to be preferred.

Soy Beans as Green Vegetables.

Hahto soy beans, introduced from Japan, are excellent for the production of green beans similar to lima and butter beans. About 115 days are required for the bean to make sufficient growth for use as a green vegetable. Although the Hahto bean is best adapted for growing in the southern states, it may also be successfully produced as a green vegetable during favorable seasons throughout the corn belt, according to specialists of the United States Department of Agriculture. Being a bush variety, it also is adapted for forage producton, its yield of green feed or seed being superior to many other varieties on the market. In a dry form the Hahto bean cooks up easier than other varieties and has a better flavor. This bean is to be grown extensively by boys' and girls' gardening clubs in the southern states during the coming season. —U. S. Dept. of Agriculture.

Clothing Prices Reduced by Large Manufacturer.

CHICAGO.—Mr. James D. Bell, head of the Bell Tailors, Adams at Green St., Chicago, Ill., said to be the largest made-to-measure clothing establishment in the world, recently stated that his firm is now able to quote prices on spring and summer suits 35% below what others ask. To prove his point he showed the writer a very attractive piece of all-wool cassimere for which they ask only $25 a suit, made to individual measure, whereas the same fabric is now being offered by others at $35 to $40 per suit. Even larger savings are offered on their higher priced suits. Every reader of Comfort should write Mr. Bell for his price list and a free copy of his style book No. 442 which contains large cloth samples of many beautiful patterns.—Adv.

Better than a mustard plaster

Once when grandma's joints commenced to ache and twinge, she used to go to the mustard pot and make a mustard plaster. Now she goes to Musterole and gets relief, but does without the blister and the plaster, too!

My, how good that Musterole feels when you rub it in gently over that lame back and those sore muscles. First you feel the gentle tingle, then the delightful, soothing coolness that reaches in the twinging joints or stiff, sore muscles.

It penetrates to the heart of the congestion. This is because it is made of oil of Mustard and other home simples. And the heat generated by Musterole will not blister.

On the contrary the peculiarity of Musterole lies in the fact that shortly it gives you such a cool, relieved feeling all about the twingey part.

And Musterole usually brings the relief while you are rubbing it on. Always keep a jar handy.

Many doctors and nurses recommend Musterole.

30c and 60c jars—$2.50 hospital size.
